There has been no session of Congress for many years when this subject has not been earnestly pressed upon those charged with the responsibility of legislation. It is idle, it is belittling, for Senators to rise now, after having occupied the time of the Senate in various ways for the last few days in order to prevent the consideration of this bill, with a pretense that here is a new proposition for the consideration of Congress. Why, sir, the President of the United States in every message, I think, since he came to that high office has recommended this legislation to Congress.

Senators say that they have heard no complaint. I do not think it strange that certain Senators on this floor are not addressed by the men who labor for the railway companies of this country. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] stated that he has never had a letter or a telegram from a railway employee complaining with respect to the need for legislation here; but he did present to the Senate the other day communications from railway officials. I do not think it strange, in view of the attitude of the Senator, that railway employees have not addressed him in the hope of having any assistance from him in this legislation.

I read to the Senate two or three days ago, when this matter was under debate, a few words from the messages of President Roosevelt. In view of the character of the discussion here to-night I will repeat them now, because, if action upon this bill is prevented at this session of Congress, I shall do what I can here to-night to impress upon the country that it is in the face of the recommendation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, of the recommendation of the Industrial Commission, of the appeals of railway employees of this country, whose petitions come from 194 of the largest brotherhoods of locomotive engineers in the country, which lie upon the table of the Senate, and of the recommendations of the President of the United States, who authorized me to-day to say on this floor that it was his earnest hope that the Senate would take action upon this bill, which is so reasonable in the limitations which it purposes to impose upon the railroads of the country.

In his message to the third session of the Fifty-eighth Congress the President said:

> I would also point out to the Congress the urgent need of legislation in the interest of the public safety, limiting the hours of labor for railroad employees in train service upon railroads engaged in interstate commerce.

In his message to this Congress, nothing having been done by the Congress pursuant to the message from which I have just quoted, he repeated the recommendation, and emphasized it in the following language:

> The excessive hours of labor to which railroad employees in train service are in many cases subjected is also a matter which may well engage the serious attention of the Congress.

To some of the Senators, Mr. President, who have been participating in this discussion to-night, who have proclaimed from this floor to the country that they have heard no demand for this legislation, I commend these words of the President of the United States:

> The strain, both mental and physical, upon those who are engaged in the movement and operation of railroad trains under modern conditions is perhaps greater than that which exists in any other industry, and if there are any reasons for limiting by law the hours of labor in any employment, they certainly apply with peculiar force to the employment of those upon whose vigilance and alertness in the performance of their duties the safety of all who travel by rail depends.

It is doubtless scarcely worth while to call them to the attention of the Senators who have declared that there is no occasion whatever for "meddling," as they term it, between the railway employees and the railroad companies, and that there are no instances reported or recorded where railway employees have been required to labor excessive hours, but I will, nevertheless, put into the RECORD, that it may go to the country with those assertions, the following instances taken from the report made by the House committee which had charge of this legislation:

I find here one instance where injury occurred and where the employee had been required to serve twenty-one consecutive hours; another, where the employee injured had been required to serve twenty-one consecutive hours; another, where the accident resulted in death; the employee had been required to serve twenty-five consecutive hours, with only four hours' rest; another, twenty-one consecutive hours without rest; another, twenty-three consecutive hours without rest; another, thirty-two consecutive hours; another, twenty consecutive hours; another, twenty-four consecutive hours; another, where the whole train crew fell asleep; they had been constantly employed for twenty-seven consecutive hours, with only four hours' rest; another, where they had been constantly employed twenty-nine consecutive hours, with only an hour and a half's rest; another, where the crew fell asleep and the accident resulted in injury; they had been employed twenty-four consecutive hours without rest; another, where they had been employed twenty consecutive hours without rest; another, where they had been employed twenty consecutive hours without rest; another, seventeen consecutive hours, with only four hours' rest; another, where they had been employed twenty consecutive hours without rest; another, twenty-two consecutive hours, with only five hours of rest; another, twenty-two consecutive hours, with only five hours of rest; another, twenty-one consecutive hours, with only five hours of rest; another, twenty-four consecutive hours without rest; another, twenty-five consecutive hours without rest.

The Senator from New Hampshire inquires whether I know anything about the accuracy of the reports made by the foreign governments with which I instituted comparison with the reports of accidents in this country when this measure was last under discussion. I know this in a general way, that the statistics of the foreign governments, the Prussian government and the English Government, from which I read are the most thorough and reliable statistics in the world. I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who referred to the statistics reported by the Interstate Commerce Commission with respect to accidents here as being so extremely accurate and so certain to include every instance of injury, that I need but read to him from a late report by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission have no account of railroad accidents, except as they are furnished by the railroad companies of this country. The railroad companies furnish such reports with reluctance. They are slow to make these reports. They are slow to report upon these accidents in detail where the detail shows gross carelessness upon their part. Upon that subject the Interstate Commerce Commission, in its report two years ago, which ought to have come to the knowledge of the Senator from New Hampshire and the other Senators who have opposed this measure, said:

> Railway officials often seem to think it is their duty to withhold facts on account of some real or supposed liability to make disclosures which may impair the railroad's rights or interests in further judicial proceedings. Some companies seem to have adopted a settled policy to give the least possible information at all times on any and all subjects.

Mr. President, I want to suggest to those who for many days have interposed every possible objection to a vote upon this bill that in so doing they are assuming a grave responsibility. Scarcely a sun rises, Mr. President, on this country that it does not witness some accident, due to the fact that the railroad employees have been overtaxed in their service. If this legislation is to be withheld from the statute books at this session by methods such as have been employed here to defeat it, those who have engaged in that business will have to assume the responsibility for whatever casualties may befall the traveling public and the railway employees of this country, which the passage of this bill might have served to prevent.

I read from the account of one accident which appears in the Railroad Gazette, a copy of which has been handed to me. This is not a publication issued in the interests of the railway employees or the public; it is a publication issued in the interest of the railroad companies themselves, but I find in it, nevertheless, this account of one of the most serious accidents which has occurred within the past year—and we have had an appalling number, Mr. President.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin, may I inquire if there is any other conference report to come in to-night?

Mr. HALE. I hardly think so.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me to make a suggestion, it is getting very late. The Senator's speech is interesting, and I should like to hear him further; but I hope the Senator will remember that it is half after 11 o'clock, and that we have to meet to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say, Mr. President, that I will conclude in a very few minutes. I have not taken very much of the time that has been consumed in debate here to-night.

Mr. FORAKER. That is quite true, and I dislike to make a suggestion to the Senator, but we are all very much tired.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The suggestion is quite in order, and I will say to the Senator that I take it kindly, but I should like to conclude, and I will be able to in just a few moments. I want to read, Mr. President, the account of an accident which cost thirty-five lives a few months ago:

> Only yesterday an officer of an eastern trunk line told us of continued difficulty in getting operators and signal men on his roads. Not long ago a road in Pennsylvania deferred the adoption of the block system on certain lines because of the difficulty of getting reliable men who would work all day (or all night) in the woods, remote from civilization. Clearly, it will be necessary, if competent men are to be secured, not only to pay more money, but also to give the good treatment, vacations, and careful instruction and counsel that competent men desire. And how about moral courage among superintendents and dispatchers? Only a few months ago we had occasion to report an instance on an eastern road—another trunk line—of a signalman working thirty-six hours on a stretch. As we have said, going to sleep is not the greatest fault in the signal or telegraph service, for the rules, in a very simple way, provide against disastrous results from that kind of neglect; but how can a superintendent bear to be responsible even for the secondary cause of a collision? The Denver and Rio Grande apparently empowered dispatchers to permit overwork. Other roads do the same. Do we realize how very cautiously such power ought to be exercised?

In the case of that operator whose continued service caused him to go to sleep with a telegraph key in his hand resulting in a sacrifice of thirty-five lives, the dispatches record this:

> A warrant for the young man's arrest has been sworn out by the railroad officials, but he was allowed to continue at work all day.

I suppose his arrest was deferred in order to have the benefit of his services for another stretch of twenty-four hours after this accident had occurred.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say just one word in response to the remarks of Senators with respect, first, to the hearings upon this legislation. At the present session of Congress hearings were held before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives upon this bill and extended over 107 pages of printed testimony.

Mr. FORAKER. What committee is that?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives.

Mr. FORAKER. Oh, I was speaking of the Senate committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand, and I will come to that in a moment. There is attached to this also a further report of testimony of some thirty or thirty-two pages taken by the same committee upon the same subject.

Mr. President, the extreme difficulty of the railroads in making any sort of opposition to this legislation I suppose was discovered in the House hearings, and when the subject was taken up in the Senate committee there was no appearance on the part of the railroad companies to offer objection to this legislation.

Now, Mr. President, Mr. Fuller, the representative of the railroad organizations of the country, has been referred to in the course of this debate as a walking delegate, and as one who is a mere hired man; not a practical railway employee himself, but for money alone; not because of any personal interest that he has in this legislation, he is here pressing this subject upon the attention of Congress.

Mr. Fuller is a railway conductor, and is at present in the service of the Pittsburg and Lake Erie Railroad Company as such conductor. I hold here a statement signed by the general superintendent of that company certifying to that fact.

> THE PITTSBURG AND LAKE ERIE RAILROAD COMPANY,
> Pittsburg, Pa., December 27, 1899.
> To whom it may concern:
> This is to certify that Mr. H. R. Fuller is a passenger conductor at present in the employ of the Pittsburg and Lake Erie Railroad Company, and is granted leave of absence at his own request.
> His term of service is as follows: From April 1, 1887, to May 17, 1889, freight brakeman. From May 17, 1889, to October 25, 1898, freight conductor. From October 25, 1898, to date, passenger conductor.
> Yours, truly,
> J. B. YOHE, General Superintendent.

He is here as the representative of the railway employee organizations of the country, as is shown by the following statement:

> [Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, Order of Railway Conductors, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.]
> DECEMBER 1, 1905.
> To whom these presents may concern, greeting:
> This is to certify that the bearer hereof, Mr. H. R. Fuller, whose signature appears below, has been duly chosen to serve as the representative of the above-named organizations at Washington, D. C., during the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, in matters pertaining to national legislation.

W. S. STONE,
Grand Chief Engineer B. of L. E.
JOHN J. HANNAHAN,
Grand Master B. of L. F.
E. E. HART,
Grand Chief Conductor O. of R. C.
O. H. MORRISSEY,
Grand Master B. of R. T.

H. R. FULLER, Representative.

I have no doubt, Mr. President, that when the Senator from Ohio offered his amendment imposing a penalty upon railway employees under certain conditions, their representative, Mr. Fuller, promptly wired the organizations, or the heads of the organizations, apprising them of that fact. And I have no doubt that it was in response to the telegrams he sent that telegrams were received by the Senator from Ohio and that telegrams have been received by myself protesting against the amendment which he offered.

I say, Mr. President, that Mr. Fuller would have been derelict in his duty here as their representative and neglectful of the important interests which they have committed to his keeping had he not promptly reported to the heads of those organizations the amendment which he regarded as seriously harmful to their interests.

Now, Mr. President, with respect to that amendment, I have, in the few minutes that I could devote to the subject, examined the statutes of the various States which have adopted legislation similar to the legislation proposed in the pending bill. In the statutes of those States which have such statutes I am not able to find that the legislators in those States thought it essential to incorporate in those enactments any proposition to impose a penalty upon the railroad employees, and there is very good reason for its not being done. It is impossible for the railroad employees to impose upon the railroad companies with respect to the time which they have been employed in the runs upon which they are engaged. A record is kept of the time when they are called out and assigned to duty. Every train dispatcher, every official who has charge of those men in making that assignment has before him at all times an accurate record of the length of time in which they have been continuously engaged in the service upon that car.

I find that Arizona has legislated upon this subject, limiting the hours of employment for railway men engaged in the movement of trains—and that includes dispatchers and switchmen and those who have charge of the tracks as well as the train crews—and they have imposed no penalty upon the railway employees; that the State of Arkansas has such a statute, and that it never occurred to the legislators there to impose a penalty upon the employees; neither so in Florida, nor in Georgia, nor in Indiana, nor in Nebraska, nor in Texas, nor in New York, nor in the State of the Senator from Ohio, which has a statute from which I quote the following:

> Any company operating a railroad over 30 miles in length, in whole or in part within the State, shall not permit or require any conductor, engineer, fireman, brakeman, or any train man on any train, or any telegraph operator who has worked in his respective capacity for fifteen consecutive hours, to again be required to go on duty or perform any work until he has had at least eight hours' rest, except in cases of detention caused by accident, unavoidable or otherwise.

And now as to the penalty.

> Any railroad company or corporation knowingly violating any of the provisions of this act (sec. 3365–14) shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $500 nor more than $1,000 for the first offense, and for any subsequent offense of not less than $1,000 nor more than $1,500, which shall be recovered in a civil action in the name of the State.

Mr. President, a motion is pending to recommit this bill. The bill before the Senate is simple in its provisions, clear in its meaning. The amendments which have been offered have been printed and are upon the desks of Senators. They are here in their place in connection with the provisions of the bill. Each of those amendments is plain and simple. Their purpose with respect to this legislation can not be misunderstood. There are no perplexities. There is nothing to require this bill to go back to the committee excepting to hold it up and delay it as much as possible. The Senate considers important legislation, adopts amendments, complex in their character, affecting large interests, oftentimes here upon the floor without ever having those amendments printed or in any form before them upon their desks.

I submit, Mr. President, that this motion to recommit should not prevail, and I move to lay it on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin moves to lay the motion of the Senator from Ohio on the table. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for a division on that motion.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion in order that I may move for a brief executive session.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will withdraw my motion for that purpose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I call for a division on that motion.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin has, in the opinion of the Chair, a right to call for a division on his motion.

Mr. CARTER. Pending that motion, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator has not the floor to make that motion.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I was recognized and moved that the Senate adjourn. I yielded to the Senator from Pennsylvania to move to proceed to the consideration of executive business. Those motions have priority.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Technically, perhaps, the Senator is correct, but as the Senator was about rising, the Senator from Wisconsin demanded a division.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I wish to make a statement. It is evident that there is no quorum present, and that a division will disclose the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I press the motion.

Mr. PENROSE. I will state to the Senator from Wisconsin that I have no interest in these nominations, but many other Senators have.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator has a right to move that the Senate adjourn, and that is a motion that would take precedence.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yielded to the Senator from Pennsylvania to make a motion for an executive session.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from New Hampshire yielded to me.

Mr. GALLINGER. I withdrew my motion.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I call for a division upon that motion.

Mr. CARTER. Pending the call for a division, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, June 30, 1906, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 29, 1906.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by Rev. OLIVER JOHNSON, of Leslie, S. C.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RECORD.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to a change in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DALZELL. And I ask the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. COOOPER. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I introduced a rule and during the discussion of that rule I yielded time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. When the gentleman concluded, I said:

> Mr. Speaker, only one word. So far as the assertion of the gentleman from Wisconsin is concerned—that this is a deliberate attempt to continue an evil—it is untrue. If I thought as meanly of my colleagues in this House as the gentleman from Wisconsin does, I would retire from it.

Mr. Speaker, the speech which preceded that remark of mine justified it, and I have a right, as a matter of justice to myself, to have the speech that was made in the RECORD, and not another speech which entirely changes the sense.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I want to say right here that I deny that the substantial character of my speech was changed in any particular, and the gentleman can insert it all. I am perfectly willing, except the report which came to me was so ungrammatical and distorted and mistaken in many ways that I tried to make it as smooth as possible; but it contains the exact ideas I expressed on the floor.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, before I left the House last evening I went to the stenographers' desk and obtained a copy of the speech delivered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, which I hold in my hand now. It is a remarkably well-reported speech. There are very few inaccuracies of grammar. The right of the gentleman from Wisconsin to correct those nobody will deny. The right of the gentleman to make insertions and to take out parts in so far as they do not affect the meaning and purpose of the speech, no one will deny, but no gentleman has the right to change the substantial character of a speech which involves the sense and meaning of another gentleman's speech. Now, the gentleman in his speech yesterday impugned the motives and belittled the intelligence of his colleagues in this House. He impugned my motives, and whether or not the changes are substantial I will let the House and not the gentleman from Wisconsin judge. The gentleman from Wisconsin said in answer to what I had said:

> The gentleman says this is an effort to carry out the spirit of the rule. In my judgment this is an effort distinctly and deliberately to violate the spirit of the rule.

If that was not an imputation upon my motive, then I am unable to understand the English language. The gentleman from Wisconsin very cunningly changes that sentence to read in this way:

> In my judgment this is an effort which distinctly and deliberately violates the spirit of the rule.

In other words, for an imputation against my motives he suggests the results to follow the adoption of the rule. I leave it to the House to judge whether that is a substantial change or not. The gentleman said, amongst other things, after reciting certain facts:

> We go to work worse than a lot of town supervisors ever do in the most ordinary case, worse than anybody anywhere pretending to an ordinary intelligence upon serious problems, to legislate, etc.

Now, the gentleman from Wisconsin did not allow that sentence to remain in the RECORD. On the contrary, he suggested this:

> Thus compelling the House to go to work, as a board of town supervisors would not do, to legislate, etc.

The gentleman further said, gauging the intelligence of his colleagues, that we were compelled—> to take it (the report) upon the ipse dixit practically of some one who brings in a report that it contains this or that, that it made this provision in accordance with this section and leaves out a few words in another section, but "phraseologically" it does not do anything important. We have to take everything for granted without an opportunity to read.

And yet not a single solitary word of that sentence appears in the speech printed by the gentleman in the RECORD this morning. I will allow the House to judge as between the gentleman and myself, as to whether or not he changed the substance of his speech; as to whether or not he did a dishonorable thing not only with respect to the House in the mutilation of its record, but an indecent thing in respect to his colleagues, whose motives he impugned upon the floor of the House, when he came in the silence of his chamber to read over what he had said here, and had not the courage to stand by it, but deliberately, no one else being by, took it out of the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, when words are uttered upon the floor of this House in the heat of debate for which he who utters them afterwards experiences a sense of shame there is only one manly way in which to retract, and that is to recall the words in the presence of those in whose presence they were uttered. It is not manly, it is not becoming a Member of this House to do in the privacy of his chamber that which his manhood did not call on him to do in public in the presence of his colleagues. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania submit a motion?

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to insert in the RECORD the speech of the gentleman from Wisconsin as it was delivered.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am perfectly willing.

Mr. DALZELL. In lieu of the speech in the RECORD this morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that in the RECORD of this morning, in the place indicated, the reporter's notes be inserted in place of the words that appear in the RECORD.

Mr. DALZELL. With such grammatical corrections as the gentleman may see fit to make.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, this is not entirely unexpected by me. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] attacked the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], I think, for something of a similar character, in a speech which he delivered, as I recall, upon the statehood bill. What the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] said was quite in the nature of a philippic. It is only fair for me to suggest, and I do not say it in any spirit of boasting or braggadocio, that I never say to anybody, anywhere, anything that I am afraid to repeat; and nothing that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] can intimate or insinuate will have the slightest intimidating effect upon me here or elsewhere.

What I intended to say yesterday was that the special rule, as brought in, did amount to a direct and deliberate violation of the spirit of the standing rule adopted by the House. I said that to hold up conference reports until the last hours of the session and then to come in with a sort of an omnibus special rule saying that thereafter no conference report shall be printed was in distinct violation of the spirit of the rule.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I beg to suggest to the gentleman that what he did say is in the RECORD and in that report; that nothing that he can now say that he said amounts to anything in the presence of the witnesses.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will digress and answer that. Here is what I said: The gentleman will have it that I desire to impugn motives, perhaps his own motives, or the motives of some other individuals in the House; but the House will distinctly recall what I said; and I now read verbatim from the report:

Without desiring to impute anything wrongfully by way of motive to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] or to anybody else, because they are well-meaning gentlemen, it is much more reasonable, I think, to say that these reports have been held up, or rather, this rule has been brought in after these reports have been held up, and it is perhaps possible that these reports have been held up with the view to getting this rule.

Mr. DALZELL. Why did the gentleman alter that sentence? Why did the gentleman cut out a large portion of that sentence?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I did not.

Mr. DALZELL. I think you did.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Wait a moment. The gentleman has been so sort of edgewise at me ever since I voted against the Lake Erie Canal bill, which had in the first section of it a dragnet proposition that would have allowed the company to engage in any business practically, and to buy real estate anywhere in the United States, even though it might not be necessary for the purposes of the canal, that he is now and has ever since been unable properly to interpret statements like those I made. If the gentleman will retain himself in patience until after I conclude I will demonstrate that I have not impugned his motive nor said anything improper, nor in changing what I said have I done anything that I ought not to have done, because I leave in the RECORD in substance exactly what I said. Now, let me read that quotation once more. Mr. Speaker, I ask for order. This is somewhat important to me.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am reading from the report of my speech.

The SPEAKER. All gentlemen will be seated.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the reporter please read to the House the last statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania—the one that he made just a moment ago.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not catch the gentleman's request.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask that the reporter read the notes of what the gentleman from Pennsylvania just said.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the reporter will furnish the notes to the Clerk, or by consent he will read them.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. May I ask that there be order?

The REPORTER (Mr. Gray). "Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I beg to suggest to the gentleman that what he did say is in the RECORD and in that report; and nothing that he can now say that he said amounts to anything in the presence of witnesses."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is that the last?

The REPORTER. That is the last statement.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Pennsylvania by that expression gave the House to understand that I had not read correctly, or that I had read my amended speech. I read, gentlemen of the House, word for word, without emendation or omission, what the reporter gave the gentleman from Pennsylvania and gave to me as a report of my utterance on the floor yesterday; and I will now read it again. I read this to show to the House and to my friends everywhere that I did not impugn the motives of any Member of the House.

I distinctly said that I did not impugn the motives of the gentleman from Pennsylvania or of any other Member of this House. I disavowed any such intention. Here is what I said: I propose to follow it with the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself to justify my assertion that the special rule was a deliberate violation of the spirit of the original rule of the House. Now, I will read again the report of what I said yesterday, without changing a letter.

Without desiring to impute anything wrongfully by way of motive to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] or to anyone else, because they are well-meaning gentlemen, it is much more reasonable, I think, to say that these reports—that these reports have been held up, or rather, this rule has been brought in after these reports have been held up, and it is perhaps possible that these reports have been held up, with the view to getting this rule.

I will now read what the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself said yesterday, before I made that statement. The only reason, gentlemen of the House, that I did not take the floor yesterday after he indulged in his very severe criticism of me was because I thought possibly I had misunderstood the remarks he did really make in his first speech, and as I wanted to be quite accurate about it, I said nothing. But this morning on getting the RECORD I find that I had correctly heard what he said.

In my reply to what he said to the House, I told the exact truth; and I have no apology to make here or elsewhere. I stand by every word I said. And now listen. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], in reply to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], said:

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi discusses this resolution as though it had reference solely to the conference report on the rate bill. There are a great many other conference reports on other bills that are being held up because of this rule requiring them to be printed, and they are delaying the business of the House.

What did I say not justified by that statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? I said that to bring in the special rule after the gentleman from Pennsylvania had announced that these conference reports—"a great many"—were being held up because they would have to be printed in the RECORD under the rule, and therefore delay the House, was in violation of the spirit of the rule, because the spirit of the rule is this: That, when possible, conference reports ought to be printed. To get up anything in the Senate of the United States, even the most minor resolutions, it has to be printed. The most honest man in the world may make a mistake when he arises and says that this or that is the proper interpretation of a proposed amendment.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One moment. Lord Coke said that no man should ever tell the meaning of a statute unless he have the statute before him. That rule ought to appeal strongly to the judgment of every Member of this House. We are making statutes. When a conference committee brings in a report here upon important amendments, and as honest a man as the chairman or as any other Member of this House—yes, as honest as the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself—arises and says that such is the interpretation or such is the interpretation; "We have left out this, we have added that, but the meaning is unchanged," it throws a very great responsibility upon the man that makes the utterance and an equally great responsibility upon the legislator who accepts it and writes it into the statutes of the United States. And therefore I said that the spirit of the rule—and what I had in mind will be apparent to every candid and intelligent listener here—that the spirit of the rule was that every conference report ought to be printed; that during either of the last six days, however, it may be possible (the rule says on either day) to provide that such reports shall not be printed; but the fact that that proviso is there does not change the spirit of the rule. The spirit of the rule is that the House of Representatives ought to be able to read an amendment before it puts it into the law; that it ought to read a conference report before it takes the statements of the conferees as facts, because of the liability of men to err as to the meaning of certain phraseology. So much for that. I expressly disavowed any purpose to impugn the motives of the gentleman from Pennsylvania or of anybody else.

Now, how did I amend the report of that disavowal?

I amended it in this way: I struck out the word "thing" and I left it in this way:

Without desiring to impute any wrong motive.

Yesterday my remarks were:

Without desiring to impute anything wrongful by way of motive to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] or anybody else.

I changed "anybody else" to "any other Member."

I said yesterday:

They are well-meaning gentlemen.

I changed that to "honorable" gentlemen. The meaning is exactly the same. Any man who is a well-meaning man is an honorable man. An then I said:

It is much more reasonable, I think, to say that these reports have been held up, or, rather, that this rule has been brought in after these reports have been held up, and it is perhaps possible that these reports have been held up with a view to getting this rule.

I inserted the word "special" before "rule," at the end of the paragraph, because the previous sentence ends with "this rule," and I wanted to distinguish it from that sentence. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman says that I cunningly changed the sentence:

In my judgment this is an effort distinctly and deliberately to violate the spirit of the rule.

As it now reads:

In my judgment this is an effort which distinctly and deliberately violates the spirit of the rule.

That change was not made through any fear of consequences or through any desire to change the essential statement. It amounts practically to a stronger statement of fact than the one that I made, if anything, although it does not change the meaning to any candid listener; but I made it because I had in mind this, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had said:

There are a great many other conference reports on other bills that are being held up because of this rule requiring them to be printed.

Now, all this occurred late in the afternoon yesterday. We could not dispose of a "great many other conference reports" yesterday afternoon, and we did not. The balance of the "great many other conference reports" are still unprinted, and every one of them could have been printed in the RECORD this morning. Is not that true? Did not that violate the spirit of the rule? Does not the spirit of the rule mean that every conference report that can be printed shall be printed? I do not know how many other conference reports there are. There may not be another one, but in what I said I relied upon the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] that there were then a "great many other conference reports that were being held up because of the rule requiring them to be printed." If that were true, I knew and everybody else knew that between the hour of 3 and 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon and 6 o'clock, the usual hour for taking a recess, we could not dispose of a "great many conference reports," when the rate bill report was not yet acted upon, and one other—I have forgotten what it was—a very important one, was still pending.

A MEMBER. The meat amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The pure-food bill was reported before this and had already been printed, and I supposed, and everybody else supposed, that it would be taken up yesterday. It was perfectly impossible to dispose of all of these conference reports yesterday. There was nothing to prevent their being printed in the RECORD this morning, so that every Member might have seen them. Now, after listening to the first statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and making my remarks in perfect good faith, for him to rise and characterize my conduct as contemptible and my subsequent conduct as cowardly is grossly unjust.

The gentleman complains because I struck out this:

And to take it up on the ipse dixit practically of somebody who brings in a report that it contains this or that, that it made this provision in accordance with this section and leaves out a few words under another section, but phraseologically it does not do anything important. We have to take everything for granted without the opportunity to read.

That simply says in another way, in a needlessly elaborate way, what I did say later. I struck it out because it adds nothing to the sentence in which it appears. Here is the way that sentence occurs as I printed it in the RECORD:

The rule was adopted to prevent what has been done here, holding up day after day exceedingly important bills, vitally important bills, until everyone is anxious to get away, and then bringing in a special rule that all conference reports on such bills shall not be printed, thus compelling the House to go to work, as a board of town supervisors would not do, to legislate concerning these reports without having read what we are legislating about.

Practically every word of this quotation was in the original sentence.

I simply omitted the ipse dixit part, which everybody knows was true. If the report be not printed we do have to rely on the statements of gentlemen who arise and say that the report means so and so, or that an amendment means so and so. We take some gentleman's ipse dixit. There is nothing wrong about that statement. It does not impugn the motives of anybody, and, Mr. Speaker, it states an undeniable fact. If you do not have the written report to examine, what do you rely upon necessarily but the statement of some gentleman who takes the floor?

Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House one moment to what I think may have something to do with this matter. When the Lake Erie Canal bill was before the House, I opposed it in a speech and voted against it on the ground that the first section did not limit that corporation in its purchase of real estate to canal purposes, but would allow it to buy real estate anywhere for any purpose. The bill contained this provision:

Under the name and style of "The Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal Company," and by that name, style, and title shall have perpetual succession, may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, make and use a common seal, receive and acquire by purchase or otherwise real and personal property and rights of property, and may hold, use, lease, sell, mortgage, encumber, charge, pledge, grant, assign, and convey the same, and generally have and exercise all the powers usually granted to and vested in corporations of the United States of America, and especially full powers to carry out the purposes of this act.

In addition to this, the company was to have the power of eminent domain. I said at that time that the bill by its first section would permit that corporation to buy real estate anywhere for any purpose. The Senate of the United States saw fit to amend the bill by providing specifically that the company should have the right to buy real estate only for the purposes of a canal, the purpose for which it was organized. I do not know; it may be that I am entirely wrong in attributing the course of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to my position in this matter.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman is absolutely wrong; nothing of that sort ever entered my mind for a minute.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am very glad to know that fact, because the action of the Senate and House conferees in accepting the Senate amendment shows that in my speech and in my vote against the bill as it was introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania I was absolutely justified.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will say that he told the gentleman from Indiana, Judge CRUMPACKER, at the time, that the gentleman from Wisconsin was entirely correct, and that that would go out in the Senate, but under the rules of the House he did not want anybody to offer an amendment, because that would have given him an hour, and he asked for the previous question. But this has nothing to do with what is before the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the colloquy between the Members be conducted so that other Members of the House can have the benefit of what is going on.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania never intimated to me that my contention as to that proposition of law was correct. I always understood from his smile when I was making the contention that he did not believe what I said. I am glad to know that he justified my position. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania believed then what he now admits, he allowed to go through the House of Representatives a charter to a corporation which would permit it in its discretion to buy land anywhere for any purpose.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that the gentleman is not confining himself to the matter under discussion.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. PAYNE. My suggestion was the gentleman was not talking to this resolution. The bill about which he is talking has already been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of order?

Mr. PAYNE. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains it. The gentleman will discuss the matter before the House.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I was unable to find in anything I said yesterday any motive which would actuate a Member of the House of Representatives to be so exceedingly bitter as the gentleman from Pennsylvania was yesterday and again this morning toward me, because my remarks contained a distinct disavowal of any desire to impute anything wrongful by way of motive to him or to any other man on this floor. I confess to the gentleman from New York, who is so solicitous lest I be out of order in trying to defend myself here——

Mr. PAYNE. It is simply on a question of time that I interposed. We want to get on with the appropriations.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. My feelings in this matter ought to be taken into consideration a little by the distinguished gentleman from New York. I have been accused here this morning——

Mr. PAYNE. So far as I am concerned, I withdraw the point of order if the gentleman's honor is involved in the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have been accused of being dishonorable, of being cunning, of being what amounts to disreputable, and I have demonstrated that the remarks which I made were based absolutely upon a statement of fact made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself. And now I put it to the candor and to the intelligent judgment of Members of the House. I said, after the statement of fact made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that to bring in a special rule providing that thereafter no conference report should be printed, was in violation of the spirit of the House rule. Now, then, I ask if that was not true? This is the most serious charge against me. The rule in the House provides that all conference reports shall be printed except on either of the last six days of the session. There has been no resolution adopted by Congress fixing adjournment. There was nothing definite to show when the last six days would begin. Heretofore, ordinarily, the two Houses have adopted a resolution fixing definitely the hour for adjournment. When did the last six days of this session begin?

Up to this time the day for the adjournment has not been fixed. When did the last six days of this session begin?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. During the Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Congresses there was no such rule as we now have on that subject, was there? We adopted it, did we not, in the Fifty-eighth Congress?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. We adopted it on account of complaint——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the question at issue.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin will suspend. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that the gentleman is not talking to the matter before the House. As near as the Chair has been able to follow the gentleman as he is now talking, or has been for the last few minutes, the Chair sustains the point of order, and the gentleman will continue his remarks in order.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I have the consent of the gentleman to ask a question. I want to ask him if in the closing days of the long session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, by unanimous consent, a rule was not adopted in line with the rule submitted and voted in the House yesterday?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I insist upon my point or order.

The SPEAKER. To the question the gentleman has asked?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, Mr. Speaker, I thought when I was interrupted by the gentleman from South Dakota that I was discussing——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. My question was exactly in line with what you were discussing——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I thought I was talking in order. I regret very much that I was not.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what the gentleman said in concluding his remarks was this:

> So far as the assertion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is concerned, that this is a deliberate attempt to continue an evil, it is untrue. [Applause.]

I did not say anything that would justify the gentleman in making that statement. I did not say it was an attempt to continue an evil. I said that, in my judgment, this was an effort distinctly and deliberately to violate the spirit of the rule, the spirit of the rule being, after it was adopted, that all conference reports should be printed when possible, of course, but that during either of the last six days a special rule might be brought in allowing them to be considered without having been printed. That is the fair interpretation of the rule and the proper interpretation of the spirit of the rule, otherwise there is no use of having the rule at all. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had informed the House that a "great many"—those are his words—"conference reports were being held up because of this rule requiring them to be printed," and I thought that was in violation of the spirit of the rule. We could not consider a "great many" of them yesterday, and but for the special rule they would have all been printed in the RECORD, except the one or two that we considered yesterday. That is all I have to say.

I regret exceedingly that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has seen fit to use vituperation in his remarks, when I especially disavowed the slightest intention of impugning his motives or the motives of any other man on this floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] moves to expunge from the RECORD the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin made on yesterday, as indicated by him, on page 9813 of the RECORD, and insert what was said according to the reporter's notes.

The question was taken; and the Chair stated that he was in doubt.

Then, on a division, there were—ayes 66, noes 43.

So the motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 20410, the public buildings bill, be taken from the Speaker's table, and that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill known as the "public buildings bill," H. R. 20410, with Senate amendments, and to nonconcur in the Senate amendments, and asks for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to say that the State of New York unfortunately is not now represented in the Senate, and that the Senate has struck out of this bill the appropriation for $450,000 passed by the House to finish the new custom-house in New York City. I hope the gentlemen will see that the $450,000 goes back in the bill during the conference. It is a very important matter to all the people of New York, and it never should have been stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees: Mr. BARTHOLDT, Mr. BURLEIGH, and Mr. BANKHEAD.

LAKE ERIE AND OHIO RIVER CANAL.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 14396) to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, to define the powers thereof, and to facilitate interstate commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DAVIDSON] calls up the conference report on the bill H. R. 14396, which the Clerk will read.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14396) to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, to define the powers thereof, and to facilitate interstate commerce, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 16, 42, 73, 75, and 77.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 69, 70, 71, and 74; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 30: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 30, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "and with their legislative consent;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 72: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 72, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the language as proposed and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"SEC. 20. That the Government of the United States may, at any time after fifty years from the opening of the main canal to navigation, upon notice to said company of not less than one year, assume possession, control, and ownership of the said main canal, its feeders and appurtenances, and of all the rights and privileges thereunto belonging, full title to which shall, upon such assumption, be fully vested in the United States, and the United States shall thereupon pay to the said company the value of the same, to be ascertained and fixed by three arbitrators, or a majority of them, one of whom shall be appointed by the President of the United States, another by said Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal Company, and the third by the arbitrators thus selected, and said arbitrators, in fixing the value of the main canal and works appurtenant thereto so acquired by the United States, shall not consider or allow any value for the franchise conferred by this act or for earning capacity or good will: Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed as imposing any obligation upon the United States to purchase, take charge of, or operate the canals herein named, or to assume any obligation or liability therefor."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 76: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 76, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the language inserted by the amendment strike out the words "Sec. 22" and insert "Sec. 23;" and the Senate agree to the same.

J. H. DAVIDSON,
ERNEST W. ROBERTS,
Managers on the part of the House.
KNUTE NELSON,
J. H. GALLINGER,
WM. J. STONE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House on the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 14396) to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, to define the powers thereof, and to facilitate interstate commerce, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the amendments, viz:

Amendments 2, 4, 6, 7, 9, 11, 12, 17, 18, 19, 20, 22, 23, 24, 27, 28, 29, 31, 33, 34, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 44, 46, 47, 48, 49, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 67, 68, 69, 73, 74, and 75 are changes in phraseology from which the House recedes.

Amendment 1 strikes out a portion of the provision of the first section conferring power on the company, and grants to the company power to construct, equip, maintain, and operate its canals and to pledge, incumber, and mortgage its property.

Amendments 3, 5, and 8 increase the authorization of the capital stock from $300,000 to $400,000 per mile and increase the total of stock issued and bonded debt created from $600,000 to $800,000 per mile.

Amendment 10 provides that the stock subscribed for may be paid in in money or property at its fair value.

Amendment 13 makes all stocks, bonds, and other evidences of indebtedness issued in excess of the amount allowed under the act null and void.

Amendment 15 provides that no dividends shall be paid by the issue of additional capital stock or the creation of additional indebtedness, and from these the House recedes.

Amendment 16 provided that if a sinking fund for the redemption of bonds was created, it must be in lieu of dividends to stockholders, and from this the Senate recedes.

Amendment 21 is a restatement of the provision by which Congress reserves the right to regulate tolls, fares, and rates to be charged on interstate and foreign commerce, and makes the company subject to all the provisions of the interstate-commerce act.

Amendments 25 and 26 relate to a branch canal proposed to be constructed.

Amendments 30, 32, 36, and 45 compel the company to exercise the right of eminent domain and to alter and relocate other highways, etc., in conformity with the laws of the State through which the canals may be constructed.

Amendment 35 strikes out the House provision with reference to proceeding in the United States courts to determine the question of damages for altering highways or other works, for the reason that the laws of each State, respectively, are entirely sufficient for this purpose, and from these the House recedes.

Amendment 42 permitted the company to use all the flow of any river or stream except the normal minimum discharge of the same. The Senate recedes from this and restores the House provisions, which restrains the company from using the flow of any river or stream below the reasonable requirements of any city, village, or municipality using the same.

Amendment 43 restrains the company from diverting any water from the Niagara River or from any of its tributaries above the Falls.

Amendment 50 provides that the canals shall always be open to the use of all suitable and proper vessels, no matter by whom owned or operated, upon fair and equal terms.

Amendment 58 provides that freight classifications established by the company must be subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Amendment 66 strikes out the clause which expressly provides that tolls on commerce within the several States should be subject to the laws of those States, for the reason that in section 9, under amendment 21, the right to regulate tolls is especially limited to interstate and foreign commerce.

Amendment 70 reduces the time in which a sum equal to 10 per cent of the capital stock must be expended in the construction of the canal from six to three years.

Amendment 71 reduces the time in which the main canal must be finished from fifteen to ten years from the passage of this act, and from these the House recedes.

Amendment 72 strikes out section 20, under which the Government of the United States might at any time after fifty years acquire title to the canal upon payment of the value, which value was to be fixed by three arbitrators, and in the fixing of such value no valuation should be given to the franchise conferred by this act or for the earning capacity or good will of the canal. From this amendment the Senate recedes, with an amendment, so that section 20 of the House bill is restored practically as it was, with an amendment providing that nothing in this act shall be construed as imposing any obligations upon the United States to purchase the canal or to assume any obligation or liability therefor.

Amendment 73 simply changes the number of a section, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment 76 makes the company subject to the laws, with reference to the taxation of corporations, of the States in which it operates, and from this the House recedes.

J. H. DAVIDSON,
ERNEST W. ROBERTS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken; and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DAVIDSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 15442) to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States; and I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15442) to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 2.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 4, and 5.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out the words "one year" where they occur in said amendment and insert in lieu thereof "two years;" and the Senate agree to the same.

ROBT. W. BONYNGE,
BENJ. F. HOWELL,
JOHN L. BURNETT,
Managers on the part of the House.
WM. P. DILLINGHAM,
BOIES PENROSE,
A. J. MCLAURIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT OF MANAGERS ON PART OF THE HOUSE.

The managers on the part of the House on the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 15442) to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the following amendments:

Amendments Nos. 1 and 2 are for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction upon the United States court for Porto Rico to naturalize aliens, and the Senate recedes from the amendments.

Amendments Nos. 3, 4, and 5 relate to the question of polygamy, and change the phraseology from "belief in polygamy" to "belief in the practice of polygamy," and the House recedes from its disagreement on those disagreements and agrees to the Senate amendment.

Amendment No. 6 is in reference to naturalization of persons not citizens who owe permanent allegiance to the United States and who take up a residence in any of the States or Territories in the United States. It permits them to become naturalized American citizens by complying with the general naturalization law, and provides that the residents within the jurisdiction of the United States owing permanent allegiance shall be regarded as residents within the United States within the meaning of the five years' residence clause of the naturalization laws. It requires such applicants to make declaration of their intention two years prior to their admission. The House recedes from its disagreement and agrees to the amendment with an amendment making two years' notice of intention instead of one year, as provided in the original Senate amendment; and the Senate agrees to the same.

ROBT. W. BONYNGE,
BENJ. F. HOWELL,
JOHN L. BURNETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BONYNGE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. J. Res. 43. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for a life-size statue of Gen. Henry Leavenworth, at Leavenworth, Kans.

The message also announced that the Senate had, in compliance with concurrent resolution No. 33 of the House of Representatives, appointed Mr. FULTON, Mr. CLAPP, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. MARTIN, and Mr. OVERMAN members of the joint committee on the part of the Senate to examine, consider, and submit to Congress recommendations upon the revision and codification of laws prepared by the Statutory Revision Commission heretofore authorized to revise and codify the laws of the United States.

JOHN E. ENGLISH.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be requested to return to the House the bill (H. R. 18901) granting a pension to John E. English.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I move the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

DIVERSION OF WATERS OF LITTLE RIVER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 20173) authorizing Henry T. Henderson and his associates to divert the waters of Little River from the lands of the United States for the use of electric light and power plant, with Senate amendments, which were read.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

ANCHORAGE OF VESSELS IN HAMPTON ROADS.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4774) relating to the movements and anchorage of vessels in Hampton Roads, the harbors of Norfolk and Newport News, and adjacent waters, in the State of Virginia.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 4774) relating to the movements and anchorage of vessels in Hampton Roads, the harbors of Norfolk and Newport News, and adjacent waters, in the State of Virginia.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adopt and prescribe suitable rules and regulations governing the movements and anchorage of vessels and rafts in Hampton Roads, the harbors of Norfolk and Newport News, and the waters adjacent thereto, in the State of Virginia; and for the purpose of enforcing the obedience of such regulations the Secretary of the Treasury may, at the request of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, detail one or more revenue cutters for duty on said waters to enforce the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That all officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service who are directed to enforce the rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, pursuant to the authority vested in him by this act, are hereby empowered and directed, in case of necessity or when a proper notice has been disregarded, to use the force at their command to remove from channels or stop any vessel found violating the prescribed rules.

SEC. 3. That in the event of the violation of any such rules or regulations by the owner, master, or person in charge of any vessel, such owner, master, or person in charge of such vessel shall be liable to a penalty of $100, and the said vessel may be holden for the payment of such penalty and may be seized and proceeded against summarily by libel for the recovery of the same in any United States district court for the district within which such vessel may be, and in the name of the officer designated by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor: Provided, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may, in his discretion, remit or mitigate such fine: Provided, also, That nothing in this act shall be construed to amend or repeal the act entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions upon certain harbors, rivers, and inland waters of the United States."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Reserving the right to object, I desire to ask a question of the gentleman. I understand, Mr. Speaker, this is a bill providing for the movements and anchorage of vessels in Hampton Roads during the proposed Jamestown Exposition. But the act does not limit its operation to that period. If the gentleman in charge of the bill will consent to an amendment limiting the operation of the act to the year 1907, I will not object to the consideration.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman modify his request?

Mr. RYAN. I will accept the amendment, as the purpose of the bill is to authorize and direct the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to adopt and prescribe rules and regulations governing the movement and anchorage of vessels and rafts in the waters named in view of the proposed display of naval and other vessels which will probably take place in connection with the Jamestown Exposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will indicate the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I will give the amendment. After the last word insert:

And provided further, That this act shall not go into force and effect until the 1st day of January, 1907, and shall not remain in force longer than the 1st day of January, 1908.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill insert: "And provided further, That this act shall not go into force and effect until the 1st day of January, 1907, and shall not remain in force longer than the 1st day of January, 1908."

Mr. RYAN. I accept that amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RYAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. FRANCIS RIVER, ARKANSAS.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 20407.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20407) to authorize the Baldwin and Dague Lumber Company to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River in Arkansas.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Baldwin and Dague Lumber Company, of Dague, Ark., its successors and assigns, be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a logging road bridge and approaches thereto across the St. Francis River, at or near the corner line between the northwest corner of section 1, township 9 north, range 5 east, in Cross County, and the southeast corner of section 35, township 10 north, range 5 east, in Poinsett County, in the State of Arkansas, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MACON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONSTRUCTION OF LOCK AT PLAQUEMINE, LA.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution (No. 625) for an investigation of the delay in the completion of the lock at Plaquemine, La.

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint, from the membership of the House, a committee of three, with full power, and whose duty it shall be, to make a full and complete investigation of all contracts connected with the project of the construction of the locks at Plaquemine, and the improvement of the waterways immediately connected with said project, the canceling of contracts connected therewith, and the extensions granted contractors in the performance of their contracts, and report their findings and conclusions to the House; the said committee to have full power to send for persons and papers, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, to administer oaths, to take testimony and reduce the same to writing, to employ such clerical and stenographic help as may be necessary, and to proceed, if it deems it necessary, to the locality for these purposes, all expenses to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following committee: Mr. BURTON of Ohio, Mr. LORIMER, and Mr. BURGESS.

POSITION OF FIRE PUMP ON STEAM VESSELS.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 4298.

A bill (S. 4298) to amend section 4471 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, regulation of steam vessels.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4471 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and it is hereby, amended by striking out after the words "is afloat," and before the words "Every steamer," the words "and no fire pump thus provided for shall be placed below the lower deck of the vessel;" so that said section when amended shall read as follows:

"SEC. 4471. Every steamer permitted by her certificate of inspection to carry as many as fifty passengers, or upward, and every steamer carrying passengers, which also carries cotton, hay, or hemp, shall be provided with a good double-acting steam fire pump, or other equivalent apparatus for throwing water. Such pump or other apparatus for throwing water shall be kept at all times and at all seasons of the year in good order and ready for immediate use, having at least two pipes of suitable dimensions, one on each side of the vessel, to convey the water to the upper decks, to which pipes there shall be attached, by means of stop cocks or valves, both between decks and on the upper deck, good and suitable hose of sufficient strength to stand a pressure of not less than 100 pounds to the square inch, long enough to reach to all parts of the vessel and properly provided with nozzles, and kept in good order and ready for immediate service. Every steamer exceeding 200 tons burden and carrying passengers shall be provided with two good double-acting fire pumps, to be worked by hand; each chamber of such pumps, except pumps upon steamers in service on the 28th day of February, 1871, shall be of sufficient capacity to contain not less than 100 cubic inches of water; and such pumps shall be placed in the most suitable parts of the vessel for efficient service, having suitable well-fitted hose to each pump, of at least one-half the vessel in length, kept at all times in perfect order and shipped up and ready for immediate use. On every steamer not exceeding 200 tons one of such pumps may be dispensed with. Each fire pump thus prescribed shall be supplied with water by means of a suitable pipe connected therewith, and passing through the side of the vessel so low as to be at all times under water when she is afloat. Every steamer shall also be provided with a pump which shall be of sufficient strength and suitably arranged to test the boilers thereof."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection, because I do not understand what the bill is. I ask the gentleman to give an explanation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can make a very brief statement. Under the present law, Mr. Speaker, the fire pump is required to be below the lower deck of the steamer. The present style of building these vessels—the present type of vessels—in many instances requires that the fire pump shall be contiguous to the position of the engineer, and the only change made in the present law is to authorize this stationing of the fire pump above the lower deck if necessary, in order to be contiguous to the position of the engineer. The bill is recommended unanimously by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House, and it passed the Senate unanimously.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS H. KENT.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 8825 under the rule adopted yesterday. It is a bill for the relief of Thomas H. Kent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up the following bill from the Private Calendar, under the special order of yesterday. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Thomas H. Kent, of Sweet Grass County, Mont., the sum of $2,007.20, out of any money in his possession otherwise unappropriated, for the reimbursement of the said Thomas H. Kent for money actually expended by the said Kent in causing to be made the survey known as the "Bundock survey," within the boundaries of land ceded by the Crow Indians in Montana to the United States, under treaty dated August 27, 1892, a map or plat of said survey having heretofore been filed in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and marked "11622, Indian Office."

With the following amendments recommended by the Committee on Claims:

In line 4, after the word "pay," insert "out of any money now in his hands or hereafter received from the sale of Crow lands in Montana."

In line 7, after the word "cents," strike out "out of any money in his possession otherwise unappropriated."

In line 9, after "reimbursement," strike out "of" and insert "to."

In line 10, after the word "by," strike out "the said Kent" and insert "him."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

KENNETH G. CASTLEMAN.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 20461) to reinstate Kenneth G. Castleman as a lieutenant in the Navy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the consent of the Senate, Kenneth G. Castleman a lieutenant on the active list of the Navy, to take rank next after Lieut. Willis G. Mitchell, United States Navy, subject to the usual examination for such grade.

SEC. 2. That the said Kenneth G. Castleman shall be additional to the number of officers prescribed by law for the grade of lieutenant in the Navy and to any grade to which he may hereafter be promoted, and that for the purpose of computing his pay the time of his former service as an officer in the United States Navy, from September, 1892, to January, 1905, namely, the period of twelve years and three months, shall be allowed in the longevity estimate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERLEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EMMA K. TOURGÉE.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, under the rule adopted yesterday, I desire to call up for consideration two Senate pension bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up the following on the Private Calendar, under the special order adopted yesterday.

The bill (S. 4840) granting an increase of pension to Emma K. Tourgée was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emma K. Tourgée, widow of Albion W. Tourgée, late of Company E, Twenty-seventh Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and first lieutenant Company G, One hundred and fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $17 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JOHN L. WELLS.

The next business was the bill (S. 6422) granting an increase of pension to John L. Wells.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John L. Wells, late of Company F, One hundred and eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $55 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ST. MARYS RIVER WATER POWER.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask the passage of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio presents a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The resolution (H. Res. 624) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to transmit to the House, if not inconsistent with the public interests, a statement of all permits, licenses, or other privileges granted by his Department in the St. Marys River at or near Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., for the creation of water power or for the occupancy of the waters of said river or any land adjoining the same. Also, of all permits for diversions from Lake Superior which might in any way affect the flow of the water in St. Marys River or in the canal and locks constructed by the United States Government in or adjacent to said river, or affect prospective improvements in that locality, together with such regulations and agreements as may have been promulgated or entered into by his Department relating to such licenses, permits, and other privileges.

The resolution was agreed to.

CHANNELS ALONG THE NEW JERSEY SEACOAST.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6167) to improve the channels along the New Jersey seacoast.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That authority be given to the State of New Jersey, or, through it, to any commission, individual, corporation, or municipality, singly or collectively, designated by the legislature of said State, or by a commission appointed or authorized by said legislature, to improve the channels on the New Jersey seacoast, or any portion of said coast, or the waters adjacent thereto, lying between 38 degrees 56 minutes and 40 degrees 20 minutes north latitude, by dredging, or by the construction of piers, jetties, or breakwaters, or other river and harbor work of any description or nature adapted to attain the ends now pursued by the United States Government for the advantage of said coast or the relief of commerce: Provided, That such operations shall not encroach upon those portions of said coast, or the channels adjacent thereto, for which the United States Government may undertake similar work according to its own plans: And provided, That the plans for said work shall be placed on file with the Chief of Engineers of the War Department for thirty days, during which time he is authorized to disapprove said plans and forbid such work if, in his judgment, the improvements when completed will interfere with navigation or with any works of the United States Government commenced or proposed to be made: Provided further, That no tolls or other charges upon commerce shall be imposed by those making such improvements: And provided further, That this act shall not be construed as affecting in any way the jurisdiction and control of the Federal Government over any waters that may be improved in pursuance of the provisions thereof, nor as exempting such waters from the operation of the laws heretofore or hereafter enacted by Congress for the preservation and protection of navigable waters.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURTON of Ohio, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House resolution 602.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to send to the diplomatic representatives of the United States abroad a circular letter instructing them to obtain from the several foreign governments to which they are accredited as full information as possible touching the operation of postal savings banks, from 1896 to the present time, in the several countries which have adopted them; such information to consist chiefly of the aggregate amounts on deposit, and the aggregate number of depositors, at a stated date each year during the period aforesaid, the rates of interest paid, and copies of the present laws relating to such banks; the reports received in response to said circular letter to be sent to the House of Representatives at the opening of the regular session of Congress in December next, or as soon thereafter as possible.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, in line 1, strike out "directed" and insert "requested."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

BRONZE CANNON FOR JUNCTION CITY POST, KANSAS.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 177, authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish a bronze cannon, with its carriage, limber, and accessories, to Junction City Post, No. 132, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to deliver to Junction City Post, No. 132, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, at Junction City, Kans., if the same can be done without detriment to the public service, one 12-pounder bronze field gun, now at Fort Riley, Kans., with its carriage, limber, and accessories belonging to it, to be the property of said post: Provided, That the donation shall be without expense to the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CONDUCTORS OF ELEVATORS.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Accounts I present the following substitute for House joint resolution 160.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House, miscellaneous items 1905, to the conductors of the elevators in the House wing of the Capitol the difference between the amounts received by them and the rate of $1,200 per annum from July 1, 1904, to June 30, 1906, inclusive, each, as follows: L. B. Cook, $200; George Winters, $200; M. N. O'Donnell, $200; Elmer Stanley, $239.53; Charles E. Walker, $200; J. K. Duncan, $200; in all, $1,239.53.

The resolution was considered, and agreed to.

STENOGRAPHER TO JOURNAL CLERK.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I also present the House resolution No. 610.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the stenographer to the Journal clerk of the House of Representatives, whose employment was directed pursuant to House resolution adopted December 19, 1905, be, and the same is hereby, continued for the remainder of the present Congress at the same rate of compensation, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The resolution was agreed to.

HENRY E. RHOADES.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 3506) for the relief of Henry E. Rhoades, assistant engineer, United States Navy, retired, and to postpone it indefinitely.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADMINISTRATIVE CUSTOMS BILL.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19750, and upon that I move that all general debate be closed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the customs administration bill, and pending that he moves that all general debate be closed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, before that motion is put, I have things reduced down on this side of the Chamber to a request for forty-five minutes. Could not the gentleman give us that time before general debate ceases?

Mr. PAYNE. If this side was accommodated too it would take three hours. I will say to the gentleman that after the bill is read through for amendment, and the amendments agreed upon, if there is any time for general debate, I will not object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. With that understanding, Mr. Speaker, I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman that general debate be closed?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. PAYNE was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the customs administration bill, with Mr. CAPRON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 5, 7, 13, 14, and 15 of the act entitled "An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenues," approved June 10, 1890, as amended by the act entitled "An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States," approved July 24, 1897, be, and the same are hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That whenever merchandise imported into the United States is entered by invoice, one of the following declarations, according to the nature of the case, shall be filed with the collector of the port at the time of entry by the owner, importer, consignee, or agent; which declaration so filed shall be duly signed by the owner, importer, consignee, or agent, before the collector or before a notary public or other officer duly authorized by law to administer oaths and take acknowledgments, who may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to receive such declarations and to certify to the identity of the persons making them, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and every officer so designated shall file with the collector of the port a copy of his official signature and seal: Provided, That if any of the invoices or bills of lading of any merchandise imported in any one vessel, which should otherwise be embraced in said entry, have not been received at the date of the entry, the declaration may state the fact, and thereupon such merchandise of which the invoices or bills of lading are not produced shall not be included in such entry, but may be entered subsequently.

"DECLARATION OF CONSIGNEE, IMPORTER, OR AGENT.

"I, ——— ———, do solemnly and truly declare that I am the consignee (importer or agent) of the merchandise described in the annexed entry and invoice; that the invoice and bill of lading now presented by me to the collector of ——— ——— are the true and only invoice and bill of lading by me received of all the goods, wares, and merchandise imported in the ———, whereof ——— ——— is master, from ——— ———, for account of any person whomsoever for whom I am authorized to enter the same; that the said invoice and bill of lading are in the state in which they were actually received by me, and that I do not know or believe in the existence of any other invoice or bill of lading of the said goods, wares, and merchandise; that the entry now delivered to the collector contains a just and true account of the said goods, wares, and merchandise, according to the said invoice and bill of lading; that nothing has been, on my part, nor, to my knowledge, on the part of any other person, concealed or suppressed, whereby the United States may be defrauded of any part of the duty lawfully due on the said goods, wares, and merchandise; that the said invoice and the declaration therein are in all respects true, and were made by the person by whom the same purports to have been made; and that if at any time hereafter I discover any error in the said invoice, or in the account now rendered of the said goods, wares, and merchandise, or receive any other invoice of the same, I will immediately make the same known to the collector of this district. And I do further solemnly and truly declare that to the best of my knowledge and belief [insert the name and residence of the owner or owners] is [or are] the owner (or owners) of the goods, wares, and merchandise mentioned in the annexed entry; that the invoice now produced by me exhibits the actual cost (if purchased) or the actual market value or wholesale price (if otherwise obtained) at the time of exportation to the United States in the principal markets of the country from whence imported of the said goods, wares, and merchandise, and includes and specifies the value of all cartons, cases, crates, boxes, sacks, and coverings of any kind, and all other costs, charges, and expenses incident to placing said goods, wares, and merchandise in condition, packed ready for shipment to the United States, and no other or different discount, bounty, or drawback but such as has been actually allowed on the same.

"DECLARATION OF OWNER IN CASES WHERE MERCHANDISE HAS BEEN ACTUALLY PURCHASED.

"I, ——— ———, do solemnly and truly declare that I am the owner, by purchase, of the merchandise described in the annexed entry and invoice; that the entry now delivered by me to the collector of ——— contains a just and true account of all the goods, wares, and merchandise imported by or consigned to me, in the ——— ———, whereof ——— ——— is master, from ———; that the invoice and entry which I now produce contain a just and faithful account of the actual cost of the said goods, wares, and merchandise, and include and specifies the value of all cartons, cases, crates, boxes, sacks, and coverings of any kind, and all other costs, charges, and expenses incident to placing said goods, wares, and merchandise in condition, packed ready for shipment to the United States, and no other discount, drawback, or bounty but such as has been actually allowed on the same; that I do not know nor believe in the existence of any invoice or bill of lading other than those now produced by me, and that they are in the state in which I actually received them. And I further solemnly and truly declare that I have not in the said entry or invoice concealed or suppressed anything whereby the United States may be defrauded of any part of the duty lawfully due on the said goods, wares, and merchandise; that to the best of my knowledge and belief the said invoice and the declaration thereon are in all respects true, and were made by the person by whom the same purports to have been made; and that if at any time hereafter I discover any error in the said invoice, or in the account now produced of the said goods, wares, and merchandise, or receive any other invoice of the same, I will immediately make the same known to the collector of this district.

"DECLARATION OF MANUFACTURER OR OWNER IN CASES WHERE MERCHANDISE HAS NOT BEEN ACTUALLY PURCHASED.

"I, ——— ———, do solemnly and truly declare that I am the owner (or manufacturer) of the merchandise described in the annexed entry and invoice; that the entry now delivered by me to the collector of ——— contains a just and true account of all the goods, wares, and merchandise imported by or consigned to me in the ———, whereof ——— ——— is master, from ———; that the said goods, wares, and merchandise were not actually bought by me, or by my agent, in the ordinary mode of bargain and sale, but that nevertheless the invoice which I now produce contains a just and faithful valuation of the same at their actual market value or wholesale price at the time of exportation to the United States in the principal markets of the country from whence imported for my account (or for account of myself or partners); that such actual market value is the price at which the merchandise described in the invoice is freely offered for sale to all purchasers in said markets and is the price which I would have received and was willing to receive for such merchandise sold in the ordinary course of trade in the usual wholesale quantities; that the said invoice contains also a just and faithful account of all the cost of finishing said goods, wares, and merchandise to their present condition, and includes and specifies the value of all cartons, cases, crates, boxes, sacks, and coverings of any kind, and all other costs and charges incident to placing said goods, wares, and merchandise in condition, packed ready for shipment to the United States, and no other discount, drawback, or bounty but such as has been actually allowed on the said goods, wares, and merchandise; that the said invoice and the declaration thereon are in all respects true and were made by the person by whom the same purports to have been made; that I do not know nor believe in the existence of any invoice or bill of lading other than those now produced by me, and that they are in the state in which I actually received them. I do further solemnly and truly declare that I have not in the said entry or invoice concealed or suppressed anything whereby the United States may be defrauded of any part of the duty lawfully due on the said goods, wares, and merchandise; and that if at any time hereafter I discover any error in the said invoice, or in the account now produced of the said goods, wares, and merchandise, or receive any other invoice of the same, I will immediately make the same known to the collector of this district."

With the following committee amendments:

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments.

The question was taken; and the committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question. On page 4 of this bill appear the words "discount, bounty, or drawback," and on page 7 the words "and no other discount, drawback, or bounty but such as has been actually allowed on the said goods, wares, and merchandise" appear. Will the gentleman tell us what discount or drawback or what bounty is now allowed under the law?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, that is not a question of allowance under the law. It is a question of allowance on the purchase or on the consignment of the goods—a matter between private parties.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There is a discount, bounty, or drawback allowed now?

Mr. PAYNE. That is when goods are reexported. I want to say to the gentleman that the only change in this section from the present law occurs in line 18, on page 4, where the words "by purchase" are inserted after the word "owner."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I just want to get at what discounts or drawbacks or what bounties are now allowed under the law.

Mr. PAYNE. There are no bounties allowed. I want to say——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What drawbacks are allowed?

Mr. PAYNE. Where merchandise is imported and afterwards manufactured in the United States, and then the manufactured article is exported, upon proof of that the party who imported the merchandise and who paid the duty received a drawback of the whole duty, or of 99 per cent of the whole duty.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell me what the difference is between a "rebate" and a "drawback?"

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, they are words that are used sometimes indiscriminately. In the law it says "drawbacks."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We have used the word "rebate" in some of the statutes. Now, then, what is the difference in allowing a drawback, as the gentleman has described, from allowing what is called a "rebate?" You import foreign-made goods and bring them into the United States, and when the party has paid the tariff on them you reimburse him for that—give him a rebate. Say he pays $10 or $100 tariff tax. Now, what is the difference between the two—a rebate and a drawback?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, that is an increase of the duty. If a man undervalues his goods and the board of appraisers raises the value, then he has to pay not only the duty on the present value, but also an additional duty of 1 per cent on the goods for each 1 per cent of the raised value.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But a rebate is as valid as a drawback, is it not?

Mr. PAYNE. This is not a drawback. This is an additional duty. This draws it out of the individual, not out of the Government.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. A rebate is as valid as a drawback, and permissible, is it not?

Mr. PAYNE. A rebate is hardly the proper term, because the law calls it a drawback. Still, they are used indiscriminately.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You import an article and remit the duty to the person who has paid for that article?

Mr. PAYNE. If he reexports it after manufacturing.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is not exactly my question. I fully understand that. We import a foreign-made article; and say it costs $100 and there is a $10 tariff on it. I import it and I pay $110 for that article, and the Government rebates or gives me $10 in the nature of a rebate or a drawback. Now, what is the difference in that case and the case you first stated?

Mr. PAYNE. What is that?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the difference between the case I have stated and the case which the gentleman stated himself?

Mr. PAYNE. There is no difference, only we pay back 99 per cent; in a hundred dollars it would be $99.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They were equally valid propositions of legislation?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman for that information.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the owner, consignee, or agent of any imported merchandise which has been actually purchased may, at the time when he shall make and verify his written entry of such merchandise, but not afterwards, make such addition in the entry or such deduction therefrom to the cost or value given in the invoice or pro forma invoice, or statement in form of an invoice, which he shall produce with his entry, as in his opinion may raise or lower the same to the actual market value or wholesale price of such merchandise at the time of exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from which the same has been imported; but no such addition shall be made upon entry to the invoice value of any imported merchandise obtained otherwise than by actual purchase; and the collector within whose district any merchandise may be imported or entered, whether the same has been actually purchased or procured otherwise than by purchase, shall cause the actual market value or wholesale price of such merchandise to be appraised; and if the appraised value of any article of imported merchandise subject to an ad valorem duty, or to a duty based upon or regulated in any manner by the value thereof, shall exceed the value declared in the entry by more than 5 per cent there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in addition to the duties imposed by law on such merchandise, an additional duty of 1 per cent of the total appraised value thereof for each 1 per cent that such appraised value exceeds the value declared in the entry, but the additional duties shall only apply to the particular article or articles in each invoice that are so undervalued, and shall not be imposed upon any article upon which the amount of duty imposed by law on account of the appraised value does not exceed the amount of duty that would be imposed if the appraised value did not exceed the entered value, and shall be limited to 100 per cent of the appraised value of such article or articles. Such additional duties shall not be construed to be penal, and shall not be remitted, nor payment thereof in any way avoided, except in cases arising from a manifest clerical error, nor shall they be refunded in case of exportation of the merchandise, or on any other account, nor shall they be subject to the benefit of drawback: Provided, That if the appraised value of any merchandise shall exceed the value declared in the entry by more than 100 per cent, except when arising from a manifest clerical error, such entry shall be held to be presumptively fraudulent, and the collector of customs shall seize such merchandise and proceed as in case of forfeiture for violation of the customs laws, and in any legal proceeding that may result from such seizure, the undervaluation as shown by the appraisal shall be presumptive evidence of fraud, and the burden of proof shall be on the claimant to rebut the same and forfeiture shall be adjudged, unless he shall rebut such presumption of fraudulent intent by sufficient evidence. The forfeiture provided for in this section shall apply to the whole of the merchandise or the value thereof in the case or package containing the particular article or articles in each invoice which are undervalued: Provided further, That all additional duties, penalties, or forfeitures applicable to merchandise entered by a duly certified invoice, shall be alike applicable to merchandise entered by a pro forma invoice, or statement in the form of an invoice, and no forfeiture or disability of any kind, incurred under the provisions of this section shall be remitted or mitigated by the Secretary of the Treasury. The duty shall not, however, be assessed in any case upon an amount less than the entered value.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Can not the gentleman wait until the committee amendments are read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say the section is not yet completed.

Mr. PAYNE. I think if there be no objection it would be better to read the sections of the original law and pass the amendments to those sections as we go along.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, that course will be pursued.

The Clerk read the committee amendments, as follows:

Page 8, line 3, after the word "addition," insert the words "or deduction."

Page 8, line 22, strike out the words "on account of" and insert in lieu thereof the word "upon."

Page 8, lines 23 and 24, strike out the words "if the appraised value did not exceed" and insert in lieu thereof the words "by law upon."

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I am offering an amendment to section 7. There are four separate amendments there which I offer to section 7, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments.

Page 7, line 18, strike out the words "which has been actually purchased."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman. that makes, although a simple appearing amendment, a radical change in the law. This privilege is granted only now under the law, and has been under the law as it has stood since 1890, on goods actually purchased. This would seek to extend it to consigned goods. Now, the collectors have had more difficulty with consigned goods than with any other species of goods, and for many years it was the custom of large importers, the best firms in the country, such a firm as Marshall Field & Co., of Chicago, to say that they could not import goods themselves when they bought abroad, because they could buy them cheaper of consignees here. Those consignees are generally the consignees of the manufacturers abroad. A great source of fraud on the Government has been from these consignees. We do not wish to extend this privilege to them. The committee considered this amendment, we had hearings before us on the subject, and that was the judgment of the committee.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would say in connection with this matter that I offer the amendment which has been read, and the other three which are on the Clerk's desk, because of information which I obtained from the State Department. It seems that in a recent arrangement made, a modus vivendi between the State Department and the German Government in connection with the restriction sought to be placed by the German Government on American goods, the State Department, I think after consultation with the Treasury Department, made an agreement for a temporary agreement. Letters passed between the Secretary of State and the German ambassador, and my impression and my feeling is, on information from the State Department, that unless these amendments which I have proposed are placed in this bill, it will be an evidence of bad faith by us or show that there is something in the nature of bad faith in the relations between our Government and the German Government. I certainly do not wish to do anything to interfere with the proper collection of customs or proper administration of our tariff laws, but I would rather temporarily have something disturb the system than that a well-grounded charge should be made against our Government that we had been guilty of bad faith in our relations with any other government.

Mr. SULZER. I quite agree with the gentleman from New York. What I want to find out is this: This amendment of yours would continue the matter until a new treaty was made, would it not?

Mr. OLCOTT. It is quite true it would amend the law, of course. Of course if this law should go into effect, it seems to me that our Government would not be able to carry out what it promised to carry out with the German Government.

Mr. SULZER. Briefly stated, what does your amendment do?

Mr. OLCOTT. My amendment, as the gentleman from New York has stated, makes this law apply to consigned goods as well as purchased goods.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, it is true that there was some negotiation between the State Department and the German ambassador, and it is true that the State Department recommended to Congress a change similiar to the change involved in this amendment, and I think the Secretary of the Treasury was present at the time. Whether he agreed to that change or not, he did agree to recommend another change in another particular in the bill, which will be read later, and I presume the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT] has an amendment to cover that which will follow soon after this. That arrangement did not permit the appraisers appearing before the committee and telling the truth; that did not permit the committee investigating this matter and getting at the facts, and we are unwilling, whether the State Department recommends it or not, to concede this amendment proposed to the law.

In my judgment it amounts to a change in duty or a loss in duty, not only on goods consigned from or brought in here from Germany, but goods brought in here from the whole world. We make anther concession in the bill, not going to the limits which were talked of between the Secretary of State and the German ambassador; and that was all of concession the committee was willing to make after full hearings on the subject before it. It will be remembered that by the modus vivendi the German concession lasts only a year from the 1st of July, and the change in this bill not only is conceded to Germany a year from July, as well as all other countries, but on after that, until the bill is again amended. We think we have given a good deal more to Germany than she has given to us when we make the trade we have made, and we did not feel like going to the extent recommended by Secretary Root. Therefore the bill is as it is, and I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. I would like to ask the gentleman to explain more at length how this change proposed by my colleague from New York would interfere with full collection of the revenue? Why does it make any difference whether the goods are consigned or purchased?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, the whole question of the appraisal of the goods comes in under this section, and the question of allowance of 5 per cent for guesswork on the value, and everything of that kind. And while we can reach with some reasonable certainty the value of the goods—that is, a fair appraised value, where the goods are purchased—when any manufacturer consigns the whole product of his factory to the United States or for foreign trade, it is almost impossible to establish a market value for those goods in the country where they are produced. Hence it has resulted that the great frauds against the revenue laws have been committed on consigned goods. As I said a moment ago, reputable people purchasing abroad are not able to bring in the goods and pay the duties honestly; they have to buy of the agents of consigned goods on this side, who have brought in the goods on the undervaluation and who by paying a reduced duty can get them cheaper here than we can get them from abroad. It opens a vast door for fraud that we do not want to open.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALCOTT].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 32.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, lines 3, 4, and 5, strike out the words "But no such addition or deduction shall be made upon entry to the invoice value of any imported merchandise obtained otherwise than by actual purchase."

Mr. PAYNE. That is a similar amendment to the other, and I hope it will take the same course.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment, offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 6, after colon immediately following the word "drawback," insert the following: "Provided, That where the appraised value of any merchandise exceeds the entered value by not more than 10 per cent the Secretary of the Treasury may remit the additional duties, if the board of general appraisers shall report that, in their opinion, there was no fraud or intentional undervaluation on the part of the owner, importer, or consignee of said merchandise, and shall recommend such remission."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, when the administrative act was adopted, in 1890, it had a provision similar to that, giving the importer 10 per cent leeway on a guess, and, as a rule, he guessed about 9½ per cent. In other words, they undervalued 9½ per cent, and strained their consciences to that extent. When we came to pass the act of 1897, the committee was unanimously in favor of abolishing this 10 per cent leeway. Now, if the goods have been undervalued and the valuation is raised by the board of appraisers over and above the price at which they are entered by the importer, the duties are paid according to the increased value, and an additional duty, which outsiders sometimes call a "penalty,"—but which is not a penalty, because, under the law, it is a duty—an additional duty of 1 per cent on the undervaluation is exacted upon the goods. Now, it does seem that at some time the Secretary of State agreed to recommend, and did recommend, an amendment similar to this amendment offered by my colleague from New York, but the committee did not feel it was safe to go back to the old plan of 1890 to 1897. It was sought to get this 10 per cent clause of the section in the bill, but we then thought we would go as far as 5 per cent and give them a chance to guess 4½ per cent; but we did not want to go any further than that, because it might make too great a reduction of revenues, and certainly would give the dishonest importer an advantage over the honest importer, who honestly appraised his goods and swore to his invoices when he tried to enter them. Now, by the action of the committee, after consideration, we concluded to give not to exceed 5 per cent, which we have given in this section which has just been read. So that I hope this amendment will be voted down.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, it naturally makes me feel embarrassed to object to anything the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means has to say relative to protection and high tariff, because I entirely believe in both, and always have. But I merely wish to say in regard to this matter that my interest in both of the amendments, and my desire to have them pass, is because of the fact that I believe it is the only way the Government of the United States can keep absolute faith with the German Empire.

A resolution was adopted in the House of Representatives (H. Res. No. 346) asking information from the President as to this arrangement with the German Government and was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and the following is a copy of the adverse report:

[House Report No. 1833, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the resolution (H. Res. No. 346) calling upon the President of the United States for information as to what arrangement or agreement the Department of State has made with the German Government, reports back the resolution with the recommendation that it be laid upon the table.

The resolution was submitted by the Committee on Ways and Means to the Secretary of State, who replies, under date of February 28, instant, transmitting the entire arrangement or agreement and all papers relating thereto between the United States and the German Government in reference to the subject-matter of the resolution. This correspondence and the papers received from the Secretary of State are made a part of this report, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 28, 1906.

MY DEAR MR. PAYNE: I have your letter of to-day inclosing copy of a resolution introduced in the House yesterday requesting "information as to what arrangement or agreement the Department of State has made with the German Government in reference to tariff relations between the United States and Germany."

Perhaps the simplest treatment of the subject will be to give you the information now. There has been no arrangement or agreement made with the German Government in reference to the tariff relations between the United States and Germany, except as appears in the inclosed correspondence.

The proclamation referred to in my letter of February 19, 1906, continuing the duties of section 3 of the Dingley tariff act, has been issued. The amended Consular Regulations, Nos. 678 and 680, referred to in my letter of February 16, 1906, have been prepared and will probably have been signed by the President by the time your committee meets.

Very sincerely, yours,

ELIHU ROOT.

Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 16, 1906.

EXCELLENCY: I have received from the Secretary of the Treasury a formulation of the various changes in the Customs Laws and Regulations, to which the Treasury gives its assent, upon the several points as to which you desire changes.

1. You said in your letter of November 21: "It is now almost entirely the rule that the exporter has to appear personally before the American consul in order to get his invoice legalized. Could the rule be made the exception?"

I inclose herewith, marked "A," a proposed amendment of section 678 of our consular regulations, which I think accomplishes what you desire.

2. You say: "Would it be possible to have the invoice legalized, at the choice of the exporter, in the district where the goods have been bought or in the district where the importer lives?"

The proposed amendment of regulation 678, above referred to, also provides that the invoice may be legalized, at the choice of the exporter, in the district in which the goods were bought or in the district where they were manufactured. This I understand to be a substantial compliance with your wish.

3. You say: "Could, under certain circumstances, the American consul in making his inquiries about the dutiable value be instructed to cooperate with competent German chambers of commerce?"

I inclose a proposed amendment of consular regulation No. 680, making it the duty of consular officers to confer with the German chambers of commerce and making it their duty also to report the communications which they may receive from such bodies, so that their views and action shall be before the appraising officers in this country. The proposed amended regulation 680 is marked "B."

4. You say: "Could the special agents or commissioners sent by the United States to Germany (special Treasury experts and agents), in order to investigate in cases of special importance the market value, be notified to the German Government and in certain cases cooperate with the competent German chambers of commerce?"

I inclose a proposed instruction to the agent of our Treasury Department charged with such matters in Germany which I think will accomplish what you desire. It is marked "C."

5. You say: "Could, in certain cases in which the accuracy of the value declared by the importer had been rendered probable by certificates of German official chambers of commerce, the importer be allowed, if, nevertheless, the American customs authorities do not accept his declaration, the possibility of defending himself in a more efficient way than he now can? Could the appraisers be instructed to give the motives of their decisions in all cases in which they decide against the certificates of these chambers of commerce?"

I inclose a proposed rule or order from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Board of General Appraisers, which requires them to make the hearing in such cases open and in the presence of the importer or his attorneys whenever the public interests will not be prejudiced thereby. It is believed that this will accomplish what you desire as fully as is practicable. It does not seem to be practicable to require a regular trial, as in a court of law, upon every case of appraisement. That would be something unknown to the administration of customs laws anywhere in the world and wholly incapable of practical operation. The whole theory under which our customs laws are administered is that the appraising officer shall reach a conclusion as to the value upon the best information that he can get. The rule now proposed goes as far in the direction of turning this ascertainment of value into a trial as our Treasury thinks it is possible to go. This proposed rule is marked "D."

6. You say: "Could it be arranged that an additional duty be levied only in case the appraised value exceeds the declared value more than 10 per cent?"

This would require Congressional action. I inclose, marked "E," a proposed recommendation, from the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress, which applies the rule for which you ask to the extent of 5 per cent and as to the remaining 5 per cent gives the Secretary of the Treasury authority to waive or remit the additional duty upon a certificate that the undervaluation was the result of honest difference of opinion—that is to say, under the proposed rule the additional duty would be imposed only in case the appraised value exceeds the declared value more than 5 per cent and could then be remitted up to the point of a 10 per cent difference upon a certificate of good faith.

7. You say: "Could goods on consignment be treated like goods that have been sold as regards the reexamination of costs of production?"

You will recall that in an interview with Baron Bussche he indicated this was intended to call for an application of section 7 of the customs administration law, which permits the owner or consignee of purchased merchandise at the time of entry an addition to the cost or value given in the invoice, so as to raise the invoice value to the actual market value or the wholesale price of such merchandise at the time of exportation to the United States. The second paragraph of the proposed recommendation by the Secretary of the Treasury, marked "B," contains a further recommendation for the necessary amendment of section 7 to comply with your wish regarding consigned goods.

I beg you to believe, my dear Baron, that in our treatment of all these subjects we have been actuated by a strong desire to comply with the wishes of your Government and to obviate any annoyances or hindrances to German producers and merchants in the conduct of their trade with the United States. We would greatly deplore any interference with that trade, and we are anxious to avoid, so far as it can possibly be done, every occasion for irritation on the part of the persons engaged in it. We sincerely hope that the trade between our countries may continue and increase upon both sides with mutual satisfaction and profit.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurance of my highest consideration.

ELIHU ROOT.

His Excellency BARON SPECK VON STERNBURG.

CONSULAR REGULATIONS.

SEC. 678. Invoices of merchandise purchased for export to the United States must be produced for certification to the consul of the district at which the merchandise was purchased, or in the district in which it was manufactured; but, as a rule, consular officers shall not require the personal attendance at his office of the shipper, purchaser, manufacturer, owner, or his agent, for the purpose of making declarations to invoices, but he shall certify invoices sent to him through the mails or by messenger. To conform to the statute which requires that merchandise shall be invoiced at the market value or wholesale price of such merchandise as bought and sold in usual wholesale quantities at the time of exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country whence imported, consuls will certify to invoices, the additional cost of transportation from the place of manufacture to the place of shipment whenever the invoice is presented to be consulated in a country other than the one from which the merchandise is being directly exported to the United States.

CONSULAR REGULATIONS.

680. When the invoice and declaration are received by the consul, it is his duty to examine carefully each item and satisfy himself that it is true and correct. In aid of this examination it shall be the duty of such consular officer to confer with official chambers of commerce and other trade organizations in his district, and he shall report any and all written communications from such commercial bodies and trade organizations that may be submitted to him in writing, together with all schedules of prices furnished him officially for that purpose, and the consul is authorized, in his discretion, to call for the bills of sale of merchandise purchased for export to the United States; to inquire into the cost of production of merchandise not obtained by purchase; to demand samples; and, if the conditions require it, to examine the entire consignment. Whenever an invoice is offered for certification which covers consolidated shipments consisting of the productions of different manufacturers, the consul may demand the submission of the manufacturers' bills relating thereto. Even when the merchandise has been purchased for export and the invoice sets out truly the price paid, the consul should ascertain whether the price represents the market value of the goods.

C.

In conducting investigations for purposes of discovering market value or cost of manufacture of merchandise produced within your district you are directed to confer with chambers of commerce and other trade organizations and to report to this Department all information you derive from these sources, together with price lists submitted and approved by such organizations.

D.

You are hereby directed that in reappraisement cases pending before a board of three the hearing shall be open and in the presence of the importer or his attorney whenever in the judgment of the board the public interest will not be prejudiced thereby.

E.

I beg to recommend the following amendments and modifications of the custims administrative act of June 10, 1890:

1. That section 7 of the customs administrative act of June 10, 1890, be so amended as to permit at the time entry is made such addition to the cost or value given in the invoice of consigned merchandise as in the opinion of the consignee or his agent may raise the same to the actual market value or wholesale price thereof the same as is by said act permissible of merchandise actually purchased.

2. I further recommend that section 7 be so amended as to impose no additional duty for undervaluation unless such undervaluation shall equal 5 per cent of the market value of the merchandise, and that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to remit all additional duty whenever the undervaluation is less than 10 per cent of the value of the imported merchandise, provided the Board of General Appraisers shall certify that in its opinion the undervaluation is the result of good faith, differences of opinion, or error.

IMPERIAL GERMAN EMBASSY,
Washington, February 18, 1906.

MR. SECRETARY: As the American Government has not found it possible to arrive at a decision on my memorandum of November 4, the German Government, fully recognizing the difficulties of the American Government in dealing with the question, is ready to fulfill the desire which has been expressed to me by the President and by yourself, and recommended by me to my Government. The German Government is willing to grant to the United States for a certain period those reduced customs duties which have been fixed by the treaties concluded in 1904 and 1905 between Germany on one side and Belgium, Italy, Austria-Hungary, Russia, Roumania, Switzerland, and Servia on the other side. To-day a bill will be introduced in the Reichstag with a view to authorize the Federal Council (Bundesrath) to grant to the United States of America until June 30, 1907, these reduced duties. In making this concession the German Government expects that Germany will enjoy, after March 1, 1906, the reduced duties of section 3 of the Dingley tariff, as heretofore.

May I ask you, Mr. Secretary, to favor me with a written confirmation of this at your earliest convenience?[a]

The German Government further hopes that the existing severity and rigidness of the American customs administration will be lessened, and that during the time granted the negotiations which have been entered into will continue and finally lead to a conclusion satisfactory to both parties.

Believe me, Mr. Secretary, yours, most sincerely,

STERNBURG.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of State of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 19, 1906.

EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of February 18, advising me that the German Government is willing to grant to the United States for a certain period those reduced customs duties which have been fixed by the treaties of 1904 and 1905 between Germany, Belgium, Italy, Austria-Hungary, Russia, Roumania, Switzerland, and Servia, and that a bill is about to be introduced in the Reichstag with a view to authorize the Bundesrath to grant these reduced duties to the United States until June 30, 1907.

I beg to say that upon the accomplishment of the purpose thus stated, by the assurance to the United States of such reduced duties until the 30th of June, 1907, the President will promptly issue the necessary proclamation for assuring to Germany the reduced duties of section 3 of the Dingley tariff, as heretofore.

I hope that the communication which I had the honor of addressing to you Friday, the 16th instant, enumerating certain proposed changes in the customs administrative law and regulations, will be regarded by your Government as evidence of the President's strong desire to relieve our customs administration from everything which seems to German exporters to have any feature of severity. I hope also that during the period which, under the proposed action of the German Government, will continue until the 30th of June, 1907, a satisfactory way will be found to establish a permanent basis for the mutual trade of both countries upon terms satisfactory to both. I am sure that there could not be a more sincere and kindly purpose or more reasonable and open-minded views than have actuated the representatives of both countries in the treatment of this subject, and I feel great confidence that a continuance of the same attitude on both sides will lead to a conclusion in conformity with the strong desire for real friendship between the German and American peoples which we both entertain.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

ELIHU ROOT.

His Excellency BARON SPECK VON STERNBURG.

FEBRUARY 21, 1906.

MY DEAR BARON: The President authorizes me to say that the regulation, marked "C" in the memorandum handed me by you to-day, can be modified in accordance with your suggestion by inserting the word "first;" so that it will read:

"In conducting investigations for purposes of discovering market value or cost of manufacture of merchandise produced within your district, you are directed to confer, first, with chambers of commerce and other trade organizations and to report to this Department all information you derived from these sources, together with price lists submitted and approved by such organizations."

The other memorandum relating to inclusion of the first general appraiser in the provision relating to open hearings has been sent to the Secretary of the Treasury for an expression of opinion by him, and I hope to be able to advise you regarding that to-morrow.

Always faithfully, yours,

ELIHU ROOT.

His Excellency BARON SPECK VON STERNBURG.

FEBRUARY 23, 1906.

MY DEAR BARON: Regarding the inclusion of the first general appraiser in the provision authorizing open hearing in reappraisement cases, the Secretary of the Treasury says that it can be done if you are specially urgent for it, but he thinks that I ought to say to you that he does not consider it probable that the first general appraiser will consider it practicable to give hearings which will be in the nature of court proceedings, and that he does not think the authority conferred in the new rule would be very much exercised by the first general appraiser; that is to say, he thinks that if the authority were given the appraiser would quite uniformly rule that the public interests would be prejudiced by the open hearing.

Referring to your letter of February 22, I have asked the Secretary of the Treasury to favor me with an expression of his views upon the questions which you ask, and I will communicate with you immediately upon hearing from him.

Very sincerely, yours,

ELIHU ROOT.

His Excellency BARON SPECK VON STERNBURG.

[Confidential.]

IMPERIAL GERMAN EMBASSY,
Washington, February 24, 1906.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In reply to your letter of the 23d instant permit me to say that our people interested in the matter think that the possibility of open hearings before the general appraiser is essential; they also believe that the first general appraiser will not uniformly rule that the public interests would be prejudiced by the open hearing if he is left entire discretion in this respect. I therefore would be greatly obliged to you if you would have the proposed modification inserted.

[a] And also to state that the President will issue a proclamation with regard to Section III in due time.

The negotiations in the Reichstag will begin on Tuesday next.

Believe me, Mr. Secretary, very sincerely, yours,

STERNBURG.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of State of the United States, Washington.

IMPERIAL GERMAN EMBASSY,
Washington, February 26, 1906.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Permit me, in connection with my statements of this morning, to inclose a memorandum explaining the status of our new customs law. Could I ask you to be so kind as to send me a short notice of the date on which the proclamation of the President regarding section 3 of the Dingley tariff will be issued?

Believe me, Mr. Secretary, most sincerely, yours,

STERNBURG.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT,
Washington, D. C.

[Memorandum.]

The bill has come before the Bundesrath, and will immediately be submitted to the Emperor for signature. In the meantime the Bundesrath has made use of the power conferred upon this body and decided on Saturday last to grant, until further notice, to the products of the United States the rates of the German conventional tariff, without setting a term within the fixed time. As soon as the act has received the signature of His Majesty it will be published, together with the resolution of the Bundesrath.

Mr. PAYNE. Another word. Our German friends, who are not always modest about what they ask, also wanted the duty levied upon the export price, the duty now being levied upon the market price where the goods are produced. We all well know that they have an export price which is uniform and uniformly lower than the market price at which they sell at home, and the difference in the price is often very great. Up to a few years ago on manufactured articles exported from Germany the export price was lower, and generally much lower, than the market price that goods sell for at home, and they were anxious to have our duties levied upon the export price. Of course, we can see how they would be anxious to have it that way, and I believe the Secretary of State had agreed to recommend that; but I hope this amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT].

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 7, immediately before the comma preceding the second word in the line, insert the word "further."

Mr. OLCOTT. I will withdraw that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from New York says the Germans sell their manufactured goods cheaper to the foreigner than at home. On that proposition I want to make this observation: Our manufacturers sell to foreigners cheaper than to our own people and excuse themselves by saying they have to sell their "surplus," and sell to the foreigners cheaper than to our home people to keep their mills running all the time to give their hands employment all the time.

It is not contended by anyone that every manufacturer in the United States exports; yet they are protected and prosper. Those highly protected and rich—the monopolists and trusts—do export and sell cheaper abroad than at home. Now, then, it being true that all the manufacturers do not export, how is it that these manufacturers who do not export at all run their mills all the year long, employ their hands all the year long? How do the nonexporters continue business if to do so they must export and sell abroad at less than at home? The nonexporters work all the year. They employ men all the year; they are paid at the same price, and yet those manufacturers do not export a dollar's worth of any product. So, Mr. Chairman, there is nothing that I can see in the proposition that these great, highly protected manufacturers must sell their goods to foreigners cheaper than to our people to run their industries and keep their hands employed throughout the year, and so keep their mills running the year round.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the trust question is to-day the great issue in American affairs. It will not subside until the law is rigidly enforced without fear or favor.

In my address before the National Antitrust League convention at Chicago, in February, 1900, I said:

Under the law of our country trusts are criminal. The law on the statute books against trusts is clear and plain, and the highest court in the land has passed on its validity and sustained the constitutionality of its provisions. The antitrust act of 1890 declared that every contract or combination in the form of a trust or otherwise in restraint of trade and commerce among the several States and Territories, or with foreign nations, is a conspiracy—illegal and void—and punishable by fine and imprisonment.

Under this antitrust act it seems to me every trust in the United States can be prosecuted for violation of law, and the men behind it punished for conspiracy. Every trust by its very nature is in restraint of trade and commerce and in violation of this law. If you will read the decisions the conclusion will be irresistible to the logical mind that the fault is not so much with the law as it is with the men who are sworn to enforce the law. The imperative mandate of the day is—enforce the law. Whenever the trusts have been brought before the courts and their true character shown, they have been declared illegal.

In my opinion—and I say so advisedly—the Department of Justice under the present law can institute and successfully maintain actions against every trust doing business in the United States.

What I said in 1900 is equally true to-day. The law should be enforced and the trust criminals punished. The people will, with no uncertain voice, demand such action at the coming election in the fall.

I wish to call attention here to the oldest and one of the most infamous trusts in the United States. The proofs of its criminality have been in the hands of the several Attorneys-General for more than twelve years. Yet it continues its iniquitous operations in every State east of the Ohio River, and maintains its office right here in the District of Columbia within sight of the Department of Justice. The name of this trust is the Eastern Railroad Association. Its doings are destructive of the property rights of every inventor of railway appliances in the nation. It is the oppressor of a class of men among the most useful of all our citizens.

I desire for a few moments to consider the question of property in inventions. There are some people, I am sorry to say, who have very little regard for this property—for the property right of the inventor and patentee. I think I will show that it is as sacred a property and as much entitled to the protection of the Government as any other species of property. Nay, more; I think I will show that it is a property which stands on a higher plane, and which, if there is any distinction between property, is of a higher character and order than on any other property in the land. I quote here from Walker on Patents what he says as to the right of property in inventions:

SEC. 152. The right of property which an inventor has in his invention is excelled in point of dignity by no other property right whatever. It is equaled in point of dignity only by the rights which authors have in their copyrighted books. The inventor is not the pampered favorite or beneficiary of the Government or of the nation. The benefits which he confers are greater than those which he receives. He does not cringe at the feet of power nor secure from authority an unbought privilege. He walks everywhere erect and scatters abroad the knowledge which he created. He confers upon mankind a new means of lessening toil or of increasing comfort, and what he gives can not be destroyed by use nor lost by misfortune. It is henceforth an indestructible heritage of posterity. On the other hand, he receives from the Government nothing which costs the Government or the people a dollar or a sacrifice. He receives nothing but a contract which provides that for a limited time he may exclusively enjoy his own. Compared with those who acquire property by devise or inheritance, compared with those who acquire property by gift or marriage, compared with those who acquire property by profits on sales or by interest on money, the man who acquires property in inventions by creating things unknown before occupies a position of superior dignity. Even the man who creates value by manual labor, though he rises in dignity above the heir, the donee, the merchant, and the money lender, falls in dignity below the author and the inventor. The inventor of the reaper is entitled to greater honor than his father who used the grain cradle, and the inventor of the grain cradle is entitled to greater honor than his ancestor who for a hundred generations had used the sickle. Side by side stand the inventor and the author. Their labor is the most dignified and the most honorable of all labor, and the resulting property is most perfectly theirs.

Lord Bacon gave the weight of his opinion to views somewhat similar to the foregoing. The following is a translation of one of his Latin paragraphs:

"The introduction of great inventions appears one of the most distinguished of human actions, and the ancients so considered it, for they assigned divine honors to the authors of inventions, but only heroic honors to those who displayed civil merit (such as the founders of cities and empires, legislators, the deliverers of their country from lasting misfortune, the quellers of tyrants, and the like). And if any one rightly compare them he will find the judgment of antiquity to be correct, for the benefits derived from inventions may extend to mankind in general, but civil benefits to particular lands alone; the latter, moreover, last but for a time, the former forever."—Walker on Patents, 102, 103.

By preventing the adoption of needed improvements in railway appliances this Eastern Railroad Association trust is a daily menace to the lives and safety of all the millions who travel on railroads, and especially so to the million or more railroad employees.

Now that this case has been thus publicly called to the attention of the present Attorney-General, who is showing most commendable activity in enforcing the antitrust law, I hope he will take prompt and proper action against this Eastern Railroad Association combine.

I submit the following proof:

EXHIBIT A.

THE EASTERN RAILROAD ASSOCIATION.

This association is a combination, voluntarily formed under a secret written agreement, of nearly all railroad corporations in the fifteen Atlantic coast States to secure by unity of action arbitrary control over all patented inventions applicable for use on railroads. It is without doubt the oldest illegal trust in the United States. It was formed in 1866 and has successfully pursued its iniquity for some thirty-five years.

The association's annual reports from 1867 to 1883 are on file in the United States Patent Office library, but since 1883, which is approximately the date of the present agitation against unlawful combinations, no reports have been allowed to reach the public.

Its membership in 1868 embraced 57 railroad corporations in Maryland, Pennsylvania, New York, and in the New England States. In 1883 the membership had increased to include 255 railroad corporations. The present membership is not actually known, inasmuch as the affairs of the association since 1883 have been kept secret. However, it is believed that the membership now includes at least 600 or 700 railroad corporations.

The headquarters of the combine was originally at Springfield, Mass.; afterwards, in 1878, at the Boston and Lowell station in Boston; then, in 1880, at the Grand Central Station in New York, and finally a permanent base of operations was established at Washington, D. C., the association, in 1886, purchasing for $25,000 the premises No. 614 F street NW., to be held "in trust for the sole use and benefit of the members of a certain association known as the Eastern Railroad Association."

On reference to the "Memorandum of deed in trust" (see Exhibit H), it will be seen that the conveyance was made to three members of the executive committee of the association and in a form which "has ever been held most sacred in equity." The building which is now the headquarters of the association contains large fireproof vaults with combination locks and within which are guarded the secret archives.

The railroad corporation members prior to December 4, 1878, operated under a written agreement, called a "constitution," adopted February, 1867, a copy of which is not available. On the above date an amended constitution was adopted. (See Exhibit C.) This latter constitution was revised some time prior to 1887. (See Exhibit F.)

It will be seen on reference to the constitution that all the affairs of the association are turned over to and managed by nine governors called an "executive committee." The names of the committee and the officers of the association have been published from time to time in the Travelers' Official Guide. In the Guide for December, 1904, the following list of the officials is given:

Eastern Railroad Association.—General offices, 614 F street NW., Washington, D. C.; Theodore N. Ely, president, Philadelphia, Pa.; William G. Besler, vice-president, New York; Albert A. Folsom, treasurer, Boston, Mass.; Robert J. Fisher, general counsel, Washington, D. C.; John J. Harrower, secretary, Washington, D. C.

Executive committee.—Theodore N. Ely, Pennsylvania Railroad Company; Henry F. Kenney, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company; John R. Kenly, Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company; John J. Turner, Pennsylvania Company; William G. Besler, Central Railroad Company of New Jersey; John F. Deems, New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company; Fairfax Harrison, Southern Railway Company; Fayette S. Curtis, New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company; George L. Potter, Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company.

The meaning and force of certain articles in the amended constitution were explained to the fifty-three corporation members in the twelfth annual report of the president, Exhibit D, and reveals the true nature and character of the association.

Litigation is asserted to be the association's most important business. It is stated that section 4 of the constitution is "tyrannical," and deprives "members of the liberty of individual and independent action in the settlement of claims;" that members are forbidden to settle claims independently of the permission of the executive committee, for "the money thus paid enables the party making the unjust claim to prosecute other members, which in most cases he would otherwise be unable to do;" that the members of "the association must act as a unit," and that "it is believed that this unity of action has been the true cause of our success heretofore."

In fact, this report furnishes conclusive evidence that the association was at the time, as it is now, a criminal conspiracy at common law. In State v. Burnham (15 N. H., 396, 1840) Judge Gilcrist said:

"Combinations against law or against individuals are always dangerous to the public peace and to public security. But the law by no means intends to exclude society from the benefits of united effort for legitimate purposes and such as promote the well-being of individuals or the public. It uses the word 'conspiracy' in its bad sense. An act may be innocent without being indictable where the isolated acts of an individual are not so injurious to society as to require the intervention of the law. But when innocent acts are committed by members in furtherance of a common object, and with the advantage and strength which determination and union impart to them, they assume the grave importance of a conspiracy, and the peace and order of society require their repression."

"The general principle on which the crime of conspiracy is founded is this, that the confederacy of several persons to effect any injurious object creates such a new and additional power to cause injury as requires criminal restraint, although none would be necessary were the same thing proposed or even attempted to be done by any person singly." (7 Rep. Crim. Law Com., 1843, p. 90.)

"The concentrated energy of several combined wills operating simultaneously and by concert upon any one individual is dangerous even to the cautious and circumspect. It is therefore the business of the law to protect individuals from such conspiracies. All combinations in society to effect an evil purpose are dangerous, and when their object and purpose are to cheat an individual, by whatever means, they are obnoxious to the criminal law." (Twitchell v. Comm., 9 Pa. St. R., 211.)

"I take it, then, a combination is criminal wherever the act to be done has a necessary tendency to prejudice the public or to oppress individuals by unjustly subjecting them to the power of confederates and giving effect to the purposes of the latter, whether of extortion or mischief." (Judge Gibson, Comm. v. Carlisle, Brightly's Rep., Pa. 36, 1821.)

"An association may be formed, the declared objects of which are innocent and laudable, and yet they may have secret articles or an agreement communicated only to the members by which they are banded together for purposes injurious to the peace of society; such would undoubtedly be a criminal conspiracy on proof of the fact, however meritorious and praiseworthy the declared objects might be." (Comm. v. Hunt, 4 Metcalf, 1845.)

Some time between 1878 and 1887 a further change in the constitution, as above stated, was made (Exhibit F), and in accordance with which the association has since carried on its business and exploited inventors and owners of patents.

The real purpose of the combination can be ascertained from an inspection of Article V, VI, and VII of the constitution.

From section 1, Article V, it appears that an inventor or owner of a patent can not deal directly with any member of the association. He must deal with the executive committee, persons who never wish to purchase. The executive committee determines the validity of the patent and the expediency of contesting the claim, and the railroad corporation directly interested is deprived of individual freedom of action.

Under section 2 the executive committee arbitrarily fix the basis of settlement, if fixed at all. The individual member interested has no voice in the matter.

Under section 3 the individual member sued can not settle a claim or defend the suit. The executive committee manage the suit, and corporation members in no way interested are compelled to contribute aid.

Under section 4 each member is deprived of the right of individual opinion and freedom of action.

Under section 5 the individual member is forced to accept the judgment of the executive committee when "for the best interests of the association," whatever may be the interests of the individual member. If a claim is settled, the inventor receives pay from those not using the invention. The sole condition of settlement is that such settlement is cheaper for the association than "carrying on the litigation."

Article VI fixes the penalty for violating the agreement.

Article VII authorizes the unlawful "maintenance" of suits where a majority of the members are not directly or indirectly interested and where no member of the association is a legal defendant of record.

These articles provide for the suppression of competition between the corporate members in the purchase of licenses and interests in letters patent and restrict freedom in the settlement of claims for the infringement of patents; and also for the fixing of the price by the executive committee when any interest in a patent may be purchased or any claim is to be settled, provided "such settlement or purchase can be effected at less expense to the association than the cost of carrying on the litigation."

Under its constitution and by-laws the association exists in violation of the antitrust act. The facts and law showing this to be true are fully set forth in a "statement" filed in 1900 with the Attorney-General of the United States and which accompanied a request that he direct a suit of equity to be instituted under section 4 of the act to restrain and enjoin the association. A copy of the "statement" and certain exhibits, as well as the reply of Attorney-General Griggs defending the association, are herewith submitted. (Exhibits B and I.)

The principal business of the association under and outside of its unlawful constitution and by-laws appears to embrace, first, reports upon patents, and, second, litigation.

Reports upon patents are prepared by the general counsel and a slip attached stating that they are of "no effect or binding on the association until approved by the executive committee." All applications for information by a corporate member must be made through an authorized person named by the board of directors of the corporation. The reports on the validity of patents are preserved in secret, and the inventors or owners of the patents and the general public as well never learn their substance unless accidentally. Inasmuch as there is no competition and that the reports are generally made to railroad officials unfamiliar with the art and the patent laws, and hence incompetent to criticise, it is maintained with truth that the said reports are, as a rule, superficial and arbitrary. Several reports have been seen which disclosed great ignorance of the particular arts and which prevented the introduction of very desirable safety devices upon railroads.

However incomplete, arbitrary, capricious, and unjust these reports may be, the association members are in practice bound to adopt and follow them. Any official who should ignore the report would be dismissed from service. By these secret reports it is within the power of the association to destroy the property right in a patent created by the Government, or to give value to a worthless or invalid patent if some one on the inside is adequately remunerated.

It is obviously against public policy for a combination of corporations, each exercising a public office, affected with a public use, and performing the function of the Government, to agree and covenant that they will be bound by secret decisions and reports relative to the validity or invalidity of patents for such appliances as are discovered and invented from time to time, and are adapted for cheapening, hastening, and rendering safer the transportation of freight and passengers on railroads.

Litigation is another and the most important business in which the association is engaged. (See Exhibit D.) According to one of the association's reports, it had in its treasury in 1882 the sum of $50,028.98. Of this amount immediately available for litigation and corrupt uses, $33,655 was invested in convertible bonds and stock and $10,000 loaned on call. A much larger sum is now doubtless immediately available for "running down a poor inventor with an invalid patent," who has the audacity to bring suit against a corporation member. The members of the association are domiciled in four judicial circuits. An owner of a patent commences suit in equity against a railroad corporation member in a certain district. The general counsel of the association appears for the defendant and unlawfully maintains the suit, the other corporate members of the association refusing to lawfully intervene, so they may not be bound by any judgment rendered within that district.

When the complainant takes his proofs he must pay his witnesses and railroad fares. The general counsel travels to the place of examination on a railroad pass, cross-examines the witnesses at great length to increase the per diem charges of the witness for his services and to increase the cost of printing the testimony by the complainant. When the general counsel takes testimony for the defense he rides on a pass and secures witnesses free, who also travel on passes, from among railroad employees, who are always willing to testify as instructed. The testimony may be taken in any part of the country which will entail the greatest possible expense for the complainant in railroad fares.

The general counsel secures perjurous testimony, manufactured evidence, and avails himself of all means, honest or dishonest, to defeat the suit. When the case comes on to be heard it may be before a Federal judge who has a railroad pass in his pocket. Then comes a series of appeals. Should the complainant be successful he can but seldom prove profits or damages, as the association has by its ingeniously contrived constitution prevented the establishment of a license fee. Upon application for an injunction in another judicial circuit against a railroad corporation which had participated in the defense, the general counsel will again appear and assert new defenses and allege a different claim or demand and the case must be tried anew.

Without entering into details it is a truthful statement of fact to say that the ordinary citizen is absolutely precluded from prosecuting in any Federal court a suit against a railroad corporation for infringing a patent with any hope of success.

The association is above citation in any court of justice, and in fact possesses a power superior to that exercised by any circuit court of the United States. In the annual report of 1882 the president says:

"The association has so increased in strength and usefulness that now it may be likened in one respect to a judicial authority or tribunal, to which all interested can apply for advice-respecting patented inventions in any way relating to railroads, and with the assurance that the advice given, if followed, will be supported and sustained with all the combined force and power of our membership."

In closing the thirteenth annual report, 1879, the general counsel uttered this boast:

"It appears to be the fact that during the whole period of thirteen years during which the association has been in existence no suit defended by it has resulted in a judgment against a member on appeal to the highest court; and that while some claims have been settled after suit was brought, no member defended by the association has yet, by process of law under execution, attachment, or otherwise, been compelled to pay anything on account of infringement of letters patent."

For thirty-five years this association has stripped owners of patents and inventors of their property as effectively and completely as the uncircumcised Philistines of old stripped Saul on Mount Gilboa. As stated by the Scientific American March 12, 1892: "Legislation is certainly needed to put a stop to combinations formed like the Eastern Association for the express purpose of nullifying the privileges granted to inventors by Congress."

In the first report it is stated that persons who claim damages for the infringement of their patents are "cormorants."

In the third report it is said that the usefulness of the association is becoming apparent. Members enjoy freedom from applications of "patent agents." Our relations to the Western Railroad Association, of Chicago, are such as to secure to each party the full benefit of investigations conducted at the expense of the other.

Fourth report: That under the quiet influence of our own and the Western Railroad Association the business of dealing in railroad patents is fast becoming legitimate and respectable. Owners of patents making claims against railroads are aptly denominated "patent sharks."

Sixth report: That after six years, of all the suits brought against members of the association only one has been pressed to trial, and in that case the defendant was successful, "and a fraudulent claim was permanently overthrown." Referring to certain attempts to secure extensions of patents from Congress, it is stated that "the poor inventor was employed to stand around as a figurehead and recite his misfortunes to Members of Congress for the purpose of eliciting sympathy." "It is deemed a part of prudence for the association to be properly represented at Washington during the session of Congress to watch the speculators in these defunct patents and report their earliest appearance."

Seventh report: That the association saves to the companies many hundreds of thousands of dollars annually. That during the seven years' experience of the association only three cases have actually been heard by the courts.

Eighth report: "The executive committee presents its eighth annual report with a feeling of lively satisfaction at the success which continues to attend the organization."

Ninth report: "The kindly relations hitherto existing between the executive committee of this and the Western Railroad Association are still maintained."

Eleventh report: "It has been thought advisable to accept of a low compromise rate offered by the owners of one or two patents whose claims have upon investigation been found to be valid." Data is given of twenty suits defended by the association.

Thirteenth report: it is stated that attention is called to a bill before Congress providing for a commission, appointed by the President of the United States, to examine patented improvements applicable to railroads, with power to decide which of such improvements shall be used and the amount to be paid to the owner. "But the provisions of the bill were so manifestly unconstitutional I did not think it necessary to appear as a remonstrant."

Fifteenth report: "The association can no longer be said to be an experiment. With fifteen years' experience and the resulting accumulation of valuable records and tangible assets in the form of invested securities shown by the reports of the counsel and secretary and the treasurer, it must be admitted to be an established institution, and that it has proved a success far exceeding the expectations of its founders.

"It has fully subserved the object which was intended to be accomplished, and has so increased in strength and usefulness that now it may be likened in one respect to a judicial authority or tribunal, to which all interested can apply for advice respecting patented inventions in any way relating to railroads, and with the assurance that the advice given, if followed, will be supported and sustained with all the combined force and power of our membership.

"All are apt to be blind when their own interests are concerned, but it is worthy of remark, and a subject of congratulation, that whatever may be the individual interests of our members here we meet as a brotherhood, on a common level, for a common purpose, and without respect to persons or individuals, whatever may be their circumstances or pretensions.

"It may be proper to remind you that the association makes use of no legal power or authority against its members; we are bound by no other ties than those of honor and mutual benefit. There has been some discussion as to the desirability of our acquiring the powers of a corporation. Your committee has not so far discovered any necessity for making such a radical change in the organization of the association."

EXHIBIT B.

In re The Eastern Railroad Association.

STATEMENT ACCOMPANYING A REQUEST, FILED WITH THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL, THAT SUIT IN EQUITY BE INSTITUTED AGAINST THE EASTERN RAILROAD ASSOCIATION.

"In an effort to avoid the condemnation of the law, shelter has been sought under what has ever been held most sacred in equity, a trust, a thing over which equity, to prevent fraud, has asserted and exercised an exclusive jurisdiction. The same combinations to prevent competition, condemned already by the law, are attempted to be worked out at the footstool of the chancellor, concealed in the form there most favored. It is like the outlaw grasping the horns of the altar for security, but, unlike him, it conceals its guilt and demands protection, protesting its innocence while pursuing its iniquity. The act is the culmination of corporate insolence and deceit." (Ray, Contractual Limitations, under the head of "Corporate combinations to prevent fair competition.")

STATEMENT.

The agreement of the Eastern Railroad Association, set forth in its constitution and by-laws, and its doings in accordance therewith, constitute violations of the "Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies." (26 Stat. L., chapter 647.)

I.

The constitution of the Eastern Railroad Association is a contract in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States.

THE AGREEMENT.

Prior to the 4th day of December, 1878, 53 railroad corporations, chartered under the laws of and doing business in 15 separate States—to wit, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina—had entered into an agreement by which they constituted themselves an association to be known as the "Eastern Railroad Association." On December 4, 1878, "after due discussion and deliberation," and at a special meeting of the association, an amended constitution was adopted. (Exhibit D.)

Under date of March 24, 1879, the president of the association made the twelfth annual report to the railroad corporation members, and therein called "particular attention" to, and explained the meaning of, certain provisions of the amended constitution.

During the year 1883 the railroad corporation members to the agreement numbered 255, and operated over 19,198 miles of track in 15 States. (Exhibit E; report in Patent Office library.)

In 1894 and at the present time, as far as can be learned, the membership of the association embraces some 700 railroad corporations, having 34,000 miles of track and $2,820,000,000 capital.

About 1887 the members of the association adopted a revised constitution, which each railroad company signed and by which it agreed to be bound. (Exhibit F.)

Article I of the constitution recites the purpose of the association, to wit:

"While having for its general purpose the promotion of railway interests, its leading object shall be the protection of its members against unjust claims made for patented inventions."

By Article II the members agree that any railroad company approved by the executive committee and subscribing to the articles and contributing to the expense of the association may become a member. Each company is to be represented by a duly authorized person.

By Article III the members agree that the affairs of the association shall be turned over to and managed by nine governors, called the executive committee, who shall be elected each year by the representatives of the railroad corporations at the annual meeting of the association, held in the city of New York (by-laws, Article I); that the executive committee shall elect a president, vice-president, and treasurer, selected from among themselves, and shall also elect a general counsel and secretary, and that the officers shall be the officers of the association; that the committee shall have power to elect other officers and employees, to appoint legal counsel, fix salaries and compensation for themselves and other employees, to prescribe the duties of all officers, agents, and employees, and to make by-laws for its own government.

By Article IV the members agree that annual meetings of the association shall be held; that special meetings shall be called at the request of two members of the executive committee and upon written request of the representatives of not less than five companies; that each company shall be entitled to one vote.

By Article V the members agree that the executive committee shall determine the validity or invalidity of any patent submitted for examination by any railroad corporation member; that the executive committee shall determine the expediency of contesting any claim for compensation made upon any railroad corporation member for the use of a patented invention which it has appropriated; that should the executive committee conclude (1) that a patent is valid or (2) that it is inexpedient to contest a claim for compensation made against one of the railroad members of the association, it shall be the duty of said executive committee, at the request of an associate member to negotiate (1) for the use of the patent or (2) for a settlement of the claim for compensation; that if the railroad member declines to accept the terms fixed by the executive committee for the use of the patent the association will not be responsible for the defense of any suit against such member.

That if the railroad member declines to accept the basis of settlement fixed by the executive committee when claim for compensation is made for the use of an invention, the association will not thereafter be responsible for the expense of litigation growing out of the case. That when the owner of a patent brings suit at law or in equity against a railroad member for infringing his patent adjudged invalid by the executive committee, said member shall report the suit to the secretary, and the executive committee shall manage the same thereafter at the expense of the association. That when the owner of a patent brings suit at law or in equity against a railroad member for the use of a patent which the executive committee has reported upon as valid and for the use of which the executive committee has also fixed the price, accepted by the railroad member, but not by the owner of the patent, the said railroad member shall report the suit to the secretary and the executive committee shall thereafter manage the defense at the expense of the association.

That no member shall settle a suit or claim against it after being advised that a similar suit or claim is in charge of the association for defense against another member, except with the consent of the general counsel and president of the association. That when the executive committee decide it inadvisable to assume or continue the expense of litigation arising out of a report which it has adopted, it may so notify the member against which suit has been brought. But the executive committee may compromise or settle the claim for compensation made by the owner of the patent or purchase a license for the member at the expense of the association: Provided, The settlement or purchase can be affected at less expense to the association than the cost of carrying on the litigation.

By Article VI the members agree: That expulsion shall be the penalty when any member willfully violates "these articles."

By Article VII the members agree: That the executive committee shall confer with the officers of similar associations in the United States relative to the settlement of patent claims and the trial of patent cases; meaning by "similar associations" especially the Western Railroad Association, which embraces some eighty-one railroad corporations distributed among the Western States. And that they will contribute from the trust fund to maintain the defense of suits.

By Article VIII the members agree: That they shall be assessed annually according to mileage and gross receipts "for any expenses incurred or hereafter to be incurred" in behalf of the association; and that payment of the assessments shall be enforced under penalty.

By Article IX the members agree: That any company may withdraw from the association by giving notice in writing.

The provisions recited in the by-laws and standing resolutions of the association are intended to aid in carrying out and making effective the agreement set forth in the constitution.

It should be noted that Article V of the constitution of 1887 is substantially identical with Article VI of the constitution of 1878, and that the explanation of said Article VI by the president of the association in the twelfth annual report (Exhibit D) applies to Article V of the constitution of 1887. The explanation is as follows, and reveals the true purpose and object of the agreement:

"Your committee, however, think it proper here to refer to some of the provisions of the constitution as amended.

"Particular attention is called to Article VI, which is designed to regulate the action of all concerned when a claim is made for the use of a patented invention and said claim is submitted to the association for action.

"Section 1 of this article makes it the duty of the executive committee to negotiate with an inventor or patentee whose claim it is considered inexpedient to contest; but attention is drawn to the fact that the committee must first be requested to do so by a member. In this respect the section differs from section 3 of Article VII of the old constitution. Section 2 is substantially the same as section 4 of Article VII of the old constitution; but it will be observed that if a member fails to acknowledge receipt of notice sent by the committee for fifteen days after its date, the terms of settlement proposed shall be considered as accepted by such member.

"Attention is also called to section 3 of this article, as by its terms the members, in order to avail themselves of the services of the association for defense or in settlement of claims, must notify the secretary of any suit or claim brought against them. And if any member has previously declined, or shall subsequently decline, the basis of settlement recommended by the executive committee, the association will not be responsible for any expenses for litigation such member may incur.

"Section 4 prohibits any member settling any suit or claim brought against it, after being advised by the secretary that a similar suit or claim is in charge of the association for defense in behalf of any of its members, without the consent of the secretary, indorsed by the president.

"This provision of the constitution may appear tyrannical, and it does to a certain extent deprive members of the liberty of individual and independent action in the settlement of claims; but the subject has been well considered, and the rule is believed to be essential to the successful carrying out of the main object of the association, to wit, the protection of its members against unjust claims made for patented inventions.

"One member may find it expedient to settle a claim under special inducements; but the money thus paid enables the party making the unjust claim to prosecute other members, which in most cases he would otherwise be unable to do. Again, the weaker members of the association might be unduly influenced in the settlement of such claims when they learned that a more powerful member had found it expedient to settle.

"Such methods of influencing the settlement of claims are well known to those engaged in the manipulation of fraudulent patent claims, and, if allowed to prevail, the influence and salutary effect of the association would be destroyed. To obtain the best results, the members of the association must act as a unit, and it is believed that this unity of action has been the true cause of our success heretofore."

As further revealing the association's estimate of the character of its agreement, as embodied in its constitution, the following extracts from the president's annual report,[a] March 9, 1882, are reproduced, to wit:

The association "has so increased in strength and usefulness that now it may be likened in one respect to a judicial authority or tribunal,[b] to which all interested can apply for advice respecting patented inventions in any way relating to railroads, and with the assurance that the advice given, if followed, will be supported and sustained with all the combined force and power of our membership."

"There has been some discussion as to the desirability of our acquiring the powers of a corporation. Your committee has not so far discovered any necessity for making such a radical change in the organization of the association."

THE ANTITRUST LAW.

An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

SEC. 1. Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize, any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 3. Every contract, combination in form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce in any Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or in restraint of trade or commerce between any such Territory and another, or between any such Territory or Territories and any State or States or the District of Columbia, or with foreign nations, or between the District of Columbia and any State or States or foreign nations, is hereby declared illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 4. The several circuit courts of the United States are hereby invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of this act; and it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney-General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations. Such proceedings may be by way of petition setting forth the case and praying that such violation shall be enjoined or otherwise prohibited. When the parties complained of shall have been duly notified of such petition the court shall proceed, as soon as may be, to the hearing and determination of the case; and pending such petition and before final decree, the court may at any time make such temporary restraining order or prohibition as shall be deemed just in the premises.

SEC. 5. Whenever it shall appear to the court before which any proceeding under section 4 of this act may be pending, that the ends of justice require that other parties should be brought before the court, the court may cause them to be summoned, whether they reside in the district in which the court is held or not; and subpœnas to that end may be served in any district by the marshal thereof.

SEC. 6. Any property owned under any contract or by any combination, or pursuant to any conspiracy (and being the subject thereof) mentioned in section 1 of this act, and being in the course of transportation from one State to another, or to a foreign country, shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized and condemned by like proceedings as those provided by law for the forfeiture, seizure, and condemnation of property imported into the United States contrary to law.

SEC. 7. Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by this act may sue therefor in any circuit court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained and the costs of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

SEC. 8. That the word "person" or "persons," wherever used in this act shall be deemed to include corporations and associations existing under or authorized by the laws of either the United States, the laws of any of the Territories, the laws of any State, or the laws of any foreign country.

Approved, July 2, 1890.

ARGUMENT.

Section 1 of the antitrust act states:

"Every contract * * * in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States * * * is hereby declared to be illegal."

The law assumes that trade and commerce among the several States shall be free, and that this freedom shall extend to all persons, natural as well as artificial, and also embrace all subjects-matter, whether corporeal or incorporeal, which can be bought, sold, or exchanged.

Chief Justice Fuller, in United States v. Knight (156 U. S., 11), said:

"The Constitution does not provide that interstate commerce shall be free, but, by the grant of this exclusive power to regulate it, it was left free except as Congress might impose restraints."

No limitation has ever been fixed by the Supreme Court to the phrase "commerce among the States." Its narrowest definition at least embraces "the conduct of individuals" "in buying and selling or barter."

On argument in Gibbon v. Ogden (9 Wheaton) it was claimed that navigation was not included within the meaning of the term; and the court remarked, at page 190:

"The mind can scarcely conceive of a system for regulating commerce (between the States) which shall * * * be confined to prescribing rules for the conduct of individuals in the actual employment of buying and selling or of barter."

Other deliverances on the subject are as follows:

"Commerce is undoubtedly traffic. But it is also something more; it is intercourse." (Gibbon v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 181.)

"Sale is the object of importation, and it is an essential element of commerce." (Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 419.)

"Commerce is intercourse; one of its most ordinary ingredients is traffic." (Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 446.)

"Commerce is a term of the largest import. It comprehends intercourse for the purpose of trade in any and all of its forms, including the transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities between the citizens of our country and the citizens of other countries, and between the citizens of different States." (Welton v. State of Missouri, 1 Otto, 275.)

"Commerce with foreign countries and among the States, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities." (County of Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U. S., 702.)

"The negotiation of sales of goods which are in another State, for the purpose of introducing them into the State in which the negotiation is made, is interstate commerce." (Robbins v. Shelby Taxing District, 120 U. S., 497.) (1886.)

"While the completely internal commerce of a State is reserved to the State itself, because never surrendered to the General Government, commerce, the regulation of which is committed by the Constitution to Congress, comprehends traffic, navigation, and every species of commercial intercourse or trade between the United States, among the several States, and the Indian tribes." (Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson, 154 U. S., 447.) (1894.)

"Definitions as to what constitutes interstate commerce are not easily given, so that they shall clearly define the full meaning of the term. We know from the cases decided in this court that it is a term of very large significance. It comprehends, as it is said, intercourse for the purpose of trade in any and all its forms, including transportation, sale, purchase, and the exchange of commodities between the citizens of different States." (Justice Peckham in Hopkins v. United States, October 24, 1898, 171 U. S., 597.)

(See United States v. Addyston Pipe and Steel Company, 54 U. S. App., 723 et seq. Supreme Court decision December 4, 1899, 175 U. S., 211.)

From the above definitions it may be said that the transfer by a person domiciled in one State to a person domiciled in another State of any interest in a patent by assignment, grant, or license, or negotiations

[a] On file in the United States Patent Office library.

[b] It is not within the power of individuals or corporations to create judicial tribunals for the final and conclusive settlement of controversies. (102 Ind., 262, 1885.)

preliminary or preparatory to such transfer, constitute trade or commerce among the several States.

The Congress by positive enactment has declared that there shall be freedom of trade or commerce in patents for inventions and interests therein throughout the United States. Section 4898, Revised Statutes of the United States, reads:

"Every patent or any interest therein shall be assignable in law by an instrument in writing; and the patentee or his assigns or legal representatives may, in like manner, grant and convey an exclusive right under his patent to the whole or any specified part of the United States."

There are three classes of persons in whom the patentee can vest an interest of some kind in the patent. They are an assignee, a grantee of an exclusive sectional right, and a licensee. (Potter v. Holland, 4 Blatchford, 406.)

The courts have repeatedly affirmed the existence of a free and open market for patent property throughout the United States. Justice Davis, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in ex parte Robinson, 2 Biss., 309 (1870), a case arising under an act of the State of Indiana "regulating the sale of patent rights," said:

"The property in inventions exists by virtue of the laws of Congress, and no State has a right to interfere with its enjoyment or to annex conditions to the grant. If the patentee complies with the laws of Congress on the subject, he has a right to go into the open market anywhere within the United States and sell his property."

It has repeatedly been held that the acts of State legislatures which attempt to direct the manner in which patent rights shall be sold in the States are void. (See Helm v. Bank, 43 Ind., 167; Robinson on Patents, sec. 46, note 4, and sec. 1242.)

In Holliday v. Hunt (70 Ill., 113) the court recognized that the purchase and sale of a patent right constituted "traffic," and remarked of the State law:

"It is a marked discrimination against the traffic in patent rights, which can not fail to seriously prejudice and impair the rights of patentees and their assignees."

A State can not impose a license tax upon the sale of a patent. (State v. Butler, 3 Lea., 222.) (1879.)

An act respecting foreign corporations and their agents does not apply to an agent selling patented inventions. (Grove & Baker Sewing Machine Company v. Butler, 53 Ind., 454 (1876); Shock v. Singer Company, 61 Ind., 520.) (1878.)

The necessary effect of the agreement entered into by the railroad corporations, members of the Eastern Railroad Association, is the restraint of trade or commerce in patent property among the several States.

In United States v. The Trans-Missouri Freight Association (166 U. S., p. 341) Justice Peckham, referring to the agreement there under consideration, said:

"The question is one of law in regard to the meaning and effect of the agreement itself. The necessary effect of the agreement is to restrain trade or commerce, no matter what the intent was on the part of those who signed it."

The true meaning of the agreement is to be gathered according to the well-known rule, from the four corners of the agreement itself. (Judge Chitty in Mills v. Dunham, 1 Ch., 580; 1891.)

I do not think any averment is necessary as to what has been done under it (the agreement) or as to any mischief which it has actually produced. We are to consider what may be done under it and what mischief may thus arise. (Lord Campbell in Hilton v. Eckersley, 6 E. & B., 65.)

Whether the nature of the combination is injurious is to be determined by a construction of the provisions of the agreement constituting the combination, and not by its effects in actual operation. (Salt Company v. Guthrie, 35 Ohio State, 678; Atcheson v. Mallon, 43 N. Y., 149 (1870); Richardson v. Buhl, 43 N. W., 1102; 77 Mich., 632; Anderson v. Jett, 41 Alb. L. J., 104; 89 Ky., 375.)

From the plain terms of the constitution of the Eastern Railroad Association it appears to be the fact that the several hundred railroad corporations members thereof have entered into a mutual contract and agreement one with another whereby they have voluntarily abolished competition among themselves in the negotiations for the purchase of any interest in patents for inventions; that for securing "unity of action" they have handed over to a committee of nine persons, called the "executive committee," all control over all their business relating to the purchase of patent rights and licenses; that each and every of them has surrendered its liberty of individual and independent action in dealing with investors and owners of patents, and especially in negotiating settlements of claims made for the use of patented inventions; that they have delegated and surrendered to the said executive committee the power of fixing the price or prices to be paid for the use of any patented invention, and the price in payment for any unlawful appropriation of a patented invention, and the price to be paid for a license to use any patented invention, and the price to be paid for any patent or assignment thereof (assuming that in any case they intend to pay anything at all), and have bound themselves by penalties to abide by the articles of agreement and the decisions of the executive committee.

The several hundred railroad corporations members of the association and parties to the agreement are organized under the laws of the fifteen or more States. The owner of a patent domiciled in any of the States is, under the agreement, debarred from negotiating with any one of the railroad corporation members for the sale of an interest in a patent, or for the settlement of any claim for compensation against any railroad member that has infringed a patent.

As between an individual patentee or owner of a patent and the corporation members of 14 States the negotiations involve trade or commerce among the States.

In Hammerstein v. Parsons (38 Mo. App., 333) (1889) the court remarked:

"The constitution and by-laws of an association constitute a contract between the members."

It can not be gainsaid that the constitution and by-laws of the Eastern Railroad Association constitute a contract in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, and thus violate section 1 of the antitrust act.

Had the agreement as set forth in the association's constitution given the executive committee power only to report on the validity or invalidity of a patent, and then left each railroad company to its own individual and independent judgment as to whether it would purchase a license or settle for an infringement or defend any suit brought against it the agreement would perhaps not be illegal. But had the agreement been so limited it would have been useless. If each company should be allowed to act independently in dealing with owners of patents the whole agreement might as well be rescinded. The president, in explaining the provisions of the constitution (Exhibit D), reveals the real nature and essential purpose of the agreement when he says:

"To obtain the best results the members of the association must act as a unit, and it is believed that this unity of action has been the true cause of our success heretofore."

Justice Peckham, in United States v. The Joint Traffic Association (171 U. S., 505), referring to an analogous agreement, said:

"If one company is allowed, while remaining a member of the association, to fix its own rates and be guided by them, it is plain as to that company the agreement might as well be rescinded. This result was never contemplated."

The defense in the Joint Traffic case endeavored to differentiate the agreement there involved from that in the Trans-Missouri case by asserting that in the former the rates were made by the several companies and in the latter by the association. Both agreements were held to be violations of the antitrust act.

The conditions imposed upon railroad members by Section V of the constitution, aside from the provision of the remaining sections, render the agreement unlawful. In the Inter Ocean Publishing Company v. The Associated Press (184 Ill., 438) (1900) the supreme court of Illinois decided that—

"The restrictions attempted to be imposed by the Associated Press through its contracts and by-laws upon the rights of members to purchase news from other agencies which such corporation may declare to be antagonistic are null and void, as tending to create monopoly and restrict competition."

II.

The combination and confederacy of the railroad corporations composing the association to oppose individual patentees and owners of patents in the negotiations of interests in their property, and the agreement of said corporations to use certain unlawful means set forth in their constitution in so opposing, as well as their unlawful acts in pursuance thereof, constitute the association a conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States.

By the first section of the antitrust law not only are contracts in restraint of trade which impose binding obligations upon parties to the agreement not to compete illegal, but also conspiracies in restraint of trade, which cover a well-known class of cases where the confederacy proposes or attempts to prevent others from freely carrying on their trade.

The Congress intended to embrace within the statutory prohibition all conspiracies which would be illegal at common law. Illustrations of such cases are: Commonwealth v. Carlyle (Br. Rep., 36), where a combination of employers conspired to depress the wages of journeymen, and in respect to which Judge Gibson remarked:

"An association is criminal when its object is to depress the price of labor (commodity) below what it would bring if it were left without artificial excitement, by either masters or journeymen, to take its chances in the market" (p. 42).

Mogul Steam Company v. McGregor, Grow & Co. (Appeal Cases, 25). (See Judge Taft's remarks on this decision, 54 U. S. App., 211). People v. Everest (51 Hunn., 19). Wright, Criminal Conspiracy, pp. 144–181; American and English Encyclopedia of Law, Vol. IV, p. 608; Stephen's History of Criminal Law; Ray, Contractual Limitations.

First. The combination under the constitution and by-laws constitutes the conspiracy, though nothing be done in pursuance thereof. In Woodworth v. Sherman and same v. Cheever and 18 others, 3 Story, 172 (1844), Justice Story, who had at that time served thirty-five years on the bench, remarked during the course of the case:

"That he observed that the bills contained a charge of an actual combination to resist the patent. That it was a question of much importance what would be the legal effect of such a combination. That he did not intend to express any opinion on this part of the case, but that in a former case he had occasion to declare that it seemed to approach very near, if it did not actually reach, a criminal conspiracy. That in many cases it was lawful for individuals to do what could not lawfully be done by a combination. That an individual patentee might successfully resist an individual, but it was much more difficult to resist the combined force of a great number of persons united to oppose a patent."

An inspection of the agreement will disclose that the associated railroad companies, organized under the laws of 15 States, have conspired together for the purpose of restraining individual owners of patents, domiciled in the several States, from freely negotiating sales of interests in their patents and from collecting compensation from any member of the association who has appropriated a patented invention.

Second. The agreement by the association to use unlawful means in opposing owners of patents in their attempts to negotiate interests in their property constitutes the association a criminal conspiracy.

A conspiracy has been defined as—

"A combination of two or more persons by concerted action to accomplish a criminal or unlawful purpose, or some purpose not in itself criminal or unlawful, by criminal or unlawful means." (Pettibone v. United States, 13 Supreme Court Reporter, 542 (1893).)

The unlawful means which the association agrees to use are: (1) The unlawful maintenance of suits brought against any one of its members. (Art. V; secs. 3 and 5, Art. VII.) (2) The boycott. The members of the association agree by Article V not to indivually negotiate with the owner of a patent for an interest therein and not to settle a suit or claim when a similar suit or claim against another member is being maintained by the association, for, as the president of the association said in the twelfth annual report: "The money thus paid enables the party making the unjust claim to prosecute other members, which in most cases he would be otherwise unable to do." He further remarked that "this unity of action has been the true cause of our success heretofore."

Third. The acts of the association, its res gestæ, through a series of years in opposing individual patentees and owners of patents, prove the association to be a permanent conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States.

The methods and means, unlawful under the common law and by statute, employed by the association embrace:[a]

(1) The unlawful maintenance of suits and without legal intervention. (See article "Intervention," A. and E. Enc. of Pleading and Practice, Vol. XI, p. 494.)

(2) Impeding, obstructing, and defeating the due course of justice. (Sec. 5407, R. S., U. S.)

(3) Manufactured evidence.

(4) Perjury. (Sec. 5392, R. S., U. S.)

(5) Subornation of perjury. (Secs. 5393, 5440, R. S., U. S.)

[a] Statement of facts under oath now on file in the office of the Attorney-General support these charges.

(6) Oppression. (Sec. 5508, R. S., U. S.)
The association violates, and has violated, the first section of the antitrust act within the meaning of the conspiracy clause thereof.

III.

The members of the association have combined and conspired to monopolize part of the trade or commerce among the several States appertaining to the purchase and sale of interests in patents, and have consequently violated section 2 of the act.

By the agreement, as set forth in the constitution, the members turn over to the executive committee of nine governors the sole control of all purchasing of licenses from owners of patents, the settlements of claims made against individual members of the association for the appropriation of patented inventions and the maintenance of all suits. In the twelfth annual report (Exhibit D) the president states that "this unity of action has been the true cause of our success heretofore."

By suppressing competition among the members and delegating to the executive committee the power to fix prices, the sole buying by the corporation members in 15 States and the selling by the individual owners of patents domiciled in the several States, Territories, and District of Columbia is effectively controlled, and a monopoly of part of the commerce or trade among the several States or Territories is established.

Had not the main purpose of the association been the creation and acquiring of a monopoly the constitution would have provided that after the executive committee had reported upon the validity or invalidity of a patent each member should be left free to exercise its own individual and independent judgment as to the advisability of purchasing an interest in or license under the patent or settling a claim made for the use of an invention. Deprive the association of the power of compelling or agreeing upon "unity of action" and it would fall to pieces immediately.

It may be further asserted that under the provisions of Article VII of the constitution the attempt is made to further extend the monopoly to all the trade or commerce in patent rights in all the States which may be carried on or attempted to be carried on between railroad corporations and owners of patents for inventions.

But it is immaterial whether an attempt is made to monopolize the whole or any part of the trade or commerce among the States. In United States v. Knight Company (156 U. S., 16) Chief Justice Fuller said:

"Again, all the authorities agree that in order to vitiate a contract or combination it is not essential that the results should be a complete monopoly. It is sufficient if it really tends to that end and to deprive the public of the advantages which flow from free competition."

Combining or conspiring to monopolize trade or commerce among the several States may be defined as a conspiracy of two or more persons by concerted action to acquire the sole, or an excessive, power to control trade or commerce among the several States which others have the legal right to engage in independently.

Tested by this definition, the association has violated section 2 of the antitrust act.

As the headquarters of the association are in the District of Columbia, it might be shown that it violates section 3 of the act. It is at least within the jurisdiction of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and that court is authorized by section 4 to apply the third section to corporations (see section 8) doing business within the District of Columbia and bound by contract or conspiring to restrain trade locally in the District of Columbia, or between the District of Columbia and any State of Territory.

THE SCOPE OF THE ANTITRUST ACT.

Six decisions only have thus far been rendered by the Supreme Court in cases under the act, to wit: United States v. E. C. Knight Company, 156 U. S., 1; United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association, 166 U. S., 290; United States v. The Joint Traffic Association, 171 U. S., 505 (decided October 24, 1898); Hopkins et al. v. United States, 171 U. S., 578; Anderson et al. v. United States, 171 U. S., 604; Addyston Pipe and Steel Co. et al. v. United States, 175 U. S., 211.

It was decided in United States v. E. C. Knight Company that the act did not apply to "monopolies in manufacture even of a necessary of life," but to "monopolie in restraint of interstate or international trade or commerce."

The Chief Justice remarked in that case:

"What the law struck at was combinations, contracts, and conspiracies to monopolize trade and commerce among the several States or with foreign nations; but the contracts and acts of defendants related exclusively to the acquisition of the Philadelphia refineries and the business of sugar refining in Pennsylvania, and bore no direct relation to commerce between the several States or with foreign nations."

In this suit the Government neglected to secure evidence of a restraint of interstate commerce, and consequently failed.

In the United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association it was held:

That the anti-trust act applied to railroad companies.

That the true meaning and intent of the statute was that it should apply, and did apply, to "every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States," irrespective of whether the contract, combination, etc., was in reasonable or unreasonable restraint of trade or commerce.

"While the statute prohibits all combinations in the form of trusts or otherwise, the limitation is not confined to that form alone. All combinations which are in restraint of trade or commerce are prohibited, whether in the form of trusts or in any other form whatever. We think, after a careful examination, that the statute covers, and was intended to cover, common carriers by railroad." (326.)

"We are of opinion that the language used in the title refers to and includes, and was intended to include, those restraints and monopolies which are made unlawful in the body of the statute." (327.)

"Contracts in restraint of trade have been known and spoken of for hundreds of years, both in England and in this country, and the term includes all kinds of those restraints, which, in fact, restrain or may restrain trade." (328.)

"When, therefore, the body of an act pronounces as illegal every combination or contract in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, etc., the plain and ordinary meaning of such language is not limited to that kind of contract alone, which is in unreasonable restraint of trade, but all contracts are included in such language, and no exception or limitation can be added without placing in the act that which has been omitted by Congress." (328.)

"Why should not a railroad company be included in general legislation aimed at the prevention of that kind of agreement, made in restraint of trade, which may exist in all companies, which is substantially of the same nature wherever found, and which tends very much toward the same results, whether put in practice by a trading and manufacturing or by a railroad company?" (322.)

"It is entirely appropriate generally to subject corporations or persons engaged in trading or manufacturing to different rules from those applicable to railroads in their transportation business, but when the evil to be remedied is similar in both kinds of corporations, such as contracts which are unquestionably in restraint of trade, we see no reason why similar rules should not be promulgated in regard to both, and both be covered in the same statute by general language sufficiently broad to include them both." (324.)

In The United States v. The Joint Traffic Association it was held:

That the differences between the provisions contained in the Trans-Missouri and Joint Traffic agreements were not of a material and fundamental nature, and that the decision in the former case was a precedent for the latter; that the act was constitutional; that the decision of the Trans-Missouri case was not erroneous.

In Hopkins et al. v. The United States it was held:

That certain rules and regulations of a live-stock exchange "are not agreements affecting interstate commerce, within the meaning of the anti-trust law, having no direct or necessary relation to such commerce."

It appears from this decision that the members after they entered into such association "still continued their individual business in full competition with each other and that the association itself, as an association, does no business whatever."

Justice Peckham here remarked:

"The contract condemned by the statute is one whose direct and immediate effect is a restraint upon that kind of trade or commerce which is interstate.

"There must be some direct and immediate effect upon interstate commerce in order to come within the act."

In Anderson et al. v. United States it was held:

That an association of dealers who buy and sell cattle in competition with each other in a particular market, where it is open to all similar dealers, and where no attempt is made to control prices on the number of cattle bought, nor in any manner to prevent full competition between its members, is not in violation of the antitrust act, although the members are engaged in interstate commerce.

In Addyston Pipe and Steel Company v. United States it was held—

That a combination and conspiracy among six companies in regard to the manufacture and sale of cast-iron pipe, by which they agreed that there should be no competition between themselves in some 36 States and Territories and by which prices were to be fixed for each contract by the association, was in violation of the antitrust act.

From these decisions it is apparent—

That any agreement (whether contract, combination, in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy) in direct restraint of trade or commerce among the several States is illegal.

That the act is not restricted to any particular subject-matter of the buying or selling or trade or commerce among the several States.

That, further, the act is not limited in its application to any particular persons, natural or artificial, who may enter into any agreement to restrain trade or commerce among the several States.

The decision of the court of appeals for the fifth circuit in United States v. Addyston Pipe and Steel Company (54 U. S. App., 723) is especially noteworthy in positively disclosing that the scope of the antitrust act is not restricted to contracts, combinations, or conspiracies to restrain the transportation or delivery of the corpus (iron pipe) from one State to another, but extends to contracts, combinations, etc., in restraint of negotiations and sales which precede delivery of the corpus across State lines (or not). Sections 4 and 5 of the act confer jurisdiction over and power of reaching persons, companies, and corporations who have entered into agreements or combinations to hinder, interrupt, restrain, or in any way prevent full, free, and unrestricted negotiations or sales preliminary to the delivery of the corpus.

Section 6 reaches the corpus when it is in process of transportation, provided the corpus is of such a character or nature that it can be seized.

It is worth while here to observe that by the construction of the antitrust act in the trans-Missouri and joint traffic cases it is not necessary to prove that an agreement actually restrains trade in practice or in operation to render it violative of the act. The defense in the joint traffic case attempted to show the opposite, and instanced in support of its view a State statute of New York (1830), and cited three cases tried under the act, to wit, People v. Fisher (14 Wend., 9); Hooker v. Vandewater (4 Denio, 347); Stanton v. Allen (5 Denio, 434).

Under section 4, moreover, courts of equity have jurisdiction and power to issue injunctions for the purpose of and which may result in restraining the commission of crime. United States v. Trans-Mississippi Freight Association; United States v. Joint Traffic Association; Ellenbecker v. Plymouth County (134 U. S., 31); United States v. Alger (62 F. R., 824); United States v. Elliott (64 F. R., 27); United States v. Debs (64 F. R., 724). In fact, this act seems to revive, in a measure, the ancient criminal jurisdiction of the court of chancery. See Spence's Equity Jurisdiction of Court of Chancery, Vol. I, page 684.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS ARE PROPERTY AND FORM THE SUBJECT-MATTER OF TRADE OR COMMERCE AMONG THE STATES.

(I) Patents are property.

"An invention secured by patent is property, and as much entitled to protection as other property." (Cammemyer v. Newton, 94 U. S., 225.)

"Patents when rightfully issued are property, and are surrounded by the same rights and sanctions which attend all other property." (Densmore v. Scofield, 102 U. S., 375.)

"By the laws of the United States the rights of a party under a patent are his private property." (Brown v. Duchesne, 19 Howard, 197.)

"The Government has no more power to appropriate a man's property invested in a patent than it has to take his property invested in real estate." (Solomon v. United States, 137 U. S., 346.)

"The power, therefore, to issue a patent for an invention and the authority to issue an instrument for a grant of land emanate from the same source, and * * * are of the same nature, character, and validity." (United States v. A. B. T. Co., 128 U. S., 358–359.)

Robinson on Patents, section 752 et seq.

The distinction between a patent for an invention and the physical thing, as machine, article of manufacture, etc., which embodies the invention set forth in the patent should not be overlooked.

In Webber v. Virginia (103 U. S., 349) the court clearly distinguished between "the right to an invention or discovery—the incorporeal right—which the State can not interfere with," and the "tangible property," which is subject to the tax laws of the State.

"The purchase of an implement or machine for the purpose of using it in the ordinary pursuits of life stands on different ground from the purchase of the right of making and using the article." (Bloomer v. McQuewan, 14 Howard, 439.)

"There is manifest distinction between the right of property in the patent, which carries with it the power on the part of the patentee to assign it, and the right to sell the property resulting from the invention or patent." (11 Bush., 311 Ky. See also Welch v. Phelps, 14 Nebr., 134, where many cases are cited. Robinson on Patents, section 46, note 4, and section 1242.)

(II) Patents are not, properly speaking, monopolies.

Inventions were not recognized as property at common law. The Crown undertook to secure the exclusive right by patent, the same instrument as was used to create a monopoly. Thus the English courts fell into the habit of calling a patent a monopoly—one allowed and not forbidden by the statute of 21 James I. The unreflecting confounded and still confound the word and the thing.

"Now patents (for inventions) are not monopolies, as the counsel have well said, because a monopoly is that which segregates that which was common before and gives it to one person or to a class for use and profit." (Singer v. Walmsley, 1 Fish, 363; Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall., 516.)

(III) Patents form the subject-matter of trade or commerce among the several States.

Section 4898, Revised Statutes of the United States, reads:

"Every patent or any interest therein shall be assignable in law by an instrument in writing, and the patentee or his assigns or legal representatives may in like manner grant and convey an exclusive right under his patent to the whole or any specified part of the United States."

A judgment debtor may be compelled to execute and deliver an assignment of an interest in a patent to a receiver. (Ager v. Murray, 105 U. S., 126.)

"If the patentee complies with the laws of Congress on the subject, he has the right to go into the open market anywhere within the United States and sell his property." (Justice Davis, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in ex parte Robinson, 2 Biss., 309.)

Property can not be defined without enumerating seizure, use, and alienation. (Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y., 396, where the entire subject is exhaustively discussed.)

See also section 5046, Revised Statutes of the United States.

CONTRACTS, COMBINATIONS, OR CONSPIRACIES TO LOWER PRICES IN NO WISE DIFFER IN CHARACTER FROM SIMILAR CONTRACTS, ETC., TO RAISE PRICES WHEN THE PURPOSE IS THE SAME.

Lieber, in his Political Ethics, volume 2, book 4, chapter 37, has briefly and intelligently discussed this subject.

See also Commonwealth v. Carlyle (Br. Rep., 36), where it is stated that "a combination of employers to depress the wages of journeymen below what they would be if there were no recurrence to artificial means by either side is criminal."

People v. Fisher (14 Wendell, 1): "Combinations and conspiracies to enhance or reduce the price of labor or of any articles of trade or commerce are injurious."

Moore v. Bennet (29 N. E., 888): "To stifle or prevent competition, and thereby enhance or diminish prices to a point above or below what they would have been if left to the influence of unrestricted competition," is unlawful.

In United States v. Knight Company (156 U. S.) Chief Justice Fuller, at page 16, remarked:

"Contracts, combinations, or conspiracies to control domestic enterprise in manufacture, agriculture, mining, production in all its forms, or to raise or lower prices or wages, might undoubtedly tend to restrain external as well as domestic trade." * * *

Wharton's Criminal Law, tenth edition (1896), section 1365:

"To prejudice the public or Government generally, as, for instance, by unduly elevating or depressing the prices of wages or toll or of any merchantable commodity."

Section 1370:

"To suppress competition at public auction."

(Comm. v. Haines, 15 Phila. Rep., 363; Huntzinger v. Connecticut, 10 Weekly Notes, Pa., 98; Texas Standard Oil Company v. Ardoue, 83 Tex., 650; Journeymen Tailors' case, 8 Mod., 10; Comm. v. Hunt, 4 Metcalf, 111; The Queen v. Rowlands, 17 Q. Bench, 671; Hilton v. Eckersley, 6 Ellis & B., 47.)

In the statutes of Great Britain and Ireland, Volume I, page 64 (31 Edw. III), is found a law relating to merchants who by covin do abate the price of wools.

In Leiber Assissarum (27 Edw. III, 138) is specified, among other conspiracies to be investigated, that of—

"Merchants who by alliance and covin among themselves in any year put a certain price on wools which are to be sold in the country, so that none of them will buy, or otherwise pass in the purchase of wools beyond the certain price which they themselves have ordained, to the great impoverishment of the people."

Senator Hoar, who aided in formulating the antitrust act, gives the following definition of a trust:

"I understand that a trust, technically and legally, means the case of having one or more persons commit to others or to a combination of others their business or the control of their business or the management of some portion of their business, such as the selling portion or the fixing the price or the hiring of labor, with the understanding that these powers are to be exercised by the corporation or combination to whom it is committed in a manner to operate for the benefit of the persons committing to them that power ordinarily by the depression or putting up of prices." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 28, 1897.)

A contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of trade among the States, which lowers prices of whatever is to be purchased, undoubtedly violates the antitrust act; and further, any contract, combination, or conspiracy to lower prices in the District of Columbia, and thus restrain local trade, violates section 3 of the act.

THE RELATION OF QUASI PUBLIC CORPORATIONS TO THE ANTITRUST LAW.

This subject is fully discussed in United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association (166 U. S.), where numerous authorities are cited and the conclusion reached that—

"The business which the railroads do is of such a public nature that it may well be doubted, to say the least, whether any contract which imposes any restraint upon its business would not be prejudicial to the public interest."

That "while, in the absence of a statute prohibiting them, contracts of private individuals or corporations touching upon restraint in trade must be unreasonable in their nature to be held void, different considerations obtain in the case of public corporations like those of railroads," etc.

See Inter-Ocean Publishing Company v. The Associated Press (184 Ill. Rep., 438) (1900) (Exhibit IX), and also note that the by-laws of the Associated Press—declared to be illegal—are identical in force with several articles of the Eastern Railroad Association constitution.

A railroad corporation performs the function of the State (Olcott v. The Supervisors, 16 Wall., 678), and all its property is a trust fund for the sovereign power which created it. The incidental interests and profits of individuals are accidents, both in theory and in practice (Talcott v. Township of Pine Grove, 1 Flippin, 144) (1872).

In People v. Chicago Gas Trust Company it was said:

"Whatever tends to prevent competition between those engaged in a public employment or business impressed with a public character is opposed to public policy, and therefore unlawful."

The Constitution (Art. I, sec. 8, clause 8) empowers Congress to promote the progress of the useful arts by securing, for limited times, to inventors the exclusive right to their discoveries, and the Congress has repeatedly enacted laws to that end.

Patents for invention are granted under the authority of the Constitution for the promotion of a Federal purpose. (Board of Assessors of Brooklyn v. Edison Ill. Co., 156 N. Y., 417, 1898.)

The Congress also passed an act approved March 2, 1893, "to promote the safety of employees and travelers on railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their cars with automatic couplers and continuous brakes, and their locomotives with driving-wheel brakes, and for other purposes."

In a message recommending this legislation, President Harrison said:

"It is a reproach to our civilization that any class of American workmen should, in the pursuit of a useful and necessary vocation, be subjected to peril of life and limb as great as that of a soldier in time of war."

Yet there exist two combinations of railroad corporations, one of them embracing practically all the companies in the 15 Atlantic coast States and the other 81 corporations, each bound together under a written agreement, entered into voluntarily by each corporation, to "act as a unit" not only in subverting and negativing the laws enacted to promote the progress of the useful arts, but also in delaying and obstructing the enforcement of the act approved March 2, 1893.

The restriction of the introduction of patented inventions by anyone is against public policy and the public interest, and especially reprehensible when practiced by a public corporation, or a combination of 700 public corporations.

Agreements between common carriers, whether by land or by water, whereby a company covenants not to use such inventions and appliances as are discovered or invented from time to time, and are adapted to cheapening, hastening, and rendering safer the transportation of freight and passengers, are against the most obvious public policy. (Wiggins Ferry Company v. Chicago and Alton Railroad, 5 Mo. App., 347.)

In Hopkins v. Oxley Stave Company (28 C. C. App., 83 F. R., 912) the court remarked, in the course of its decision:

"Another object of the conspiracy, which was no less harmful, was to deprive the public at large of the advantages to be derived from the use of an invention."

The common law will not permit individuals or corporations to legally place themselves in a position by contract where they are required to do or not to do a particular thing, when the thing to be done or omitted is in any degree injurious to the public. (W. Va., Trans. Co. v. Ohio R. P. L. Co., 22 W. Va., 617; W. U. Teleg. Co v. Am. U. P. Co., 65 Ga., 160; Watson v. Harlem and N. Y. Nav. Co., 52 How., Pr. 348. See Ray, Contractual Limitations, p 206; Partial restriction of trade not permissible by corporations; and p. 261, Corporate Combinations to Prevent Fair Competition. Beach, Trust and Monopolies.)

By reason of the influence of the Eastern and Western Railroad Associations innumerable old methods and devices are now in use on railroads which, had competition not been suppressed, would long ago have been cast aside and replaced by improved methods and life and labor saving devices.

FREE COMPETITION IS THE GENERAL PUBLIC POLICY OF THE BODY POLITIC OR NATION.

"Competition, free and unrestricted, is the general rule which governs all the ordinary business pursuits and transactions of life." (United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association, quoting Judge Shiras, 166 U. S., 337.)

"The public policy of the Government is to be found in its statutes, and where they have not directly spoken, then in the decisions of the courts and the constant practice of the Government officials; but where the lawmaking power speaks upon a subject over which it has constitutional power to legislate, public policy in such case is what the statute enacts." (United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association, 166 U. S., 340.)

The entire body of the laws of the United States may be subdivided into—

(1) The Constitution, treaties, and statutes of the United States.
(2) The constitutions and statutes of the several States.
(3) The common law as interpreted by the Federal courts.
(4) The common law as interpreted by the State courts.

The first constitutes supreme national law, and the third and fourth subsidiary national law. A United States court, when the law governing a case is common law, follows its own judgment in the interpretation to be placed upon the law, and not the interpretation of a State court, and the State courts thereafter follow such interpretation. In this way the common law has, in fact, acquired the character of a national system and is kept substantially uniform.

To determine the public policy of the nation relative to free competition, it is only necessary to consult (1) the Constitution, treaties, and Federal statutes, and decisions of United States courts in cases arising under the same; and (2) the decisions of the Federal courts and State courts in cases at common law.

I. The Constitution empowers the Congress only to interfere at all with free competition (other than purely local within a State) in what may properly be called industrial or commercial pursuits. Thus far the coining of money (Article I, section 8, clause 5) and the postal business (clause 7) have been completely monopolized, but in connection with the latter section 3950, Revised Statutes, requires free competition in making contracts for carrying the mails. The power, under clause 3, to regulate (not monopolize) commerce has been exercised mainly in the direction of preserving freedom of interstate trade and commerce. Note the interstate-commerce law, and in particular section 5, which forbids "pooling" by common carriers, and the antitrust act.

Whatever industrial or commercial enterprises may in the future be conducted on a limited scale or be monopolized by the General Government under the authority of Article I, section 8, clauses 1 and 18, it is a fact that so far the power has for the most part been held in abeyance. The decisions of the United States courts in cases involving the construction of the Constitution or arising under the statutes have ever been in the line of preserving and promoting commercial freedom and free competition.

NOTE.—The Interstate Commerce Commission v. Railway Company (167 U. S., 479), where it was held that the Commission has no power to prescribe traffic rates for common carriers, "to evolve, as it were, out of its own consciousness the satisfactory solution of the difficult problem of just and reasonable rates for all the various roads in the country." (United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association; United States v. Joint Traffic Association.)

In Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company v. Osborne (52 Fed. Rep.) Justice Brewer said:

"Congress has not attempted to require that tariffs on all roads be uniform, nor has it attempted to place a limit in figures beyond which no company may go in its charges. The laws of business and competition have as yet been deemed sufficient restraint in that direction."

Nearly all States have legislated against the consolidation of competing lines of railroads. In a case arising under a State law (Pearsall v. Great Northern Railway Company, 161 U. S., 646) Justice Brown remarked:

"Whether the consolidation of competing lines will necessarily result in an increase of rates or whether such consolidation has generally resulted in a detriment to the public is beside the question. Whether it has had that effect or not, it certainly puts it in the power of the consolidated corporation to give it that effect; in short, puts the public at the mercy of the corporation. There is and has been for the past three hundred years, both in England and in this country, a popular prejudice against monopolies in general, which has found expression in innumerable acts of legislation. We can not say that such prejudice is not well founded. It is a matter on which the legislature is entitled to pass judgment. There are, moreover, thought to be other dangers to the moral sense of the community incident to such aggregations of wealth, which, though indirect, are even more insidious in their influence, and such as has awakened feelings of hostility which have not failed to find expression in legislative acts."

In Van Patten v. Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway (81 F. R., 545) the judge said that "the controlling element in regulating prices, values, and rates in general commercial and manufacturing business of the country" is "self-interest controlled by free competition."

"The fact that Congress has not legislated upon the subject of interstate commerce is equivalent to the declaration that it shall remain free and untrammeled." (Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S., 275; In re Debs, 158 U. S., 564.)

"Again, all the authorities agree that in order to vitiate a contract or combination it is not essential that its results should be a complete monopoly; it is sufficient if it really tends to that end and to deprive the public of the advantages which flow from free competition." (United States v. Knight Company, 156 U. S., 16.)

II. The decisions of the Federal and State courts in suits involving the interpretation of the common law have almost without exception condemned all agreements the main objects of which were the restraint or destruction of free competition. Those who before the courts and in the public press have denounced "free competition self-destructive" have been able to support their contentions by about six decisions, to wit:[a] (1) Perkins v. Lyman, 9 Mass., 522 (1813); (2) Kellogg v. Larkin, 3 Pinney, 123 (1851); (3) Schrainka v. Scharringhausen, 8 Mo. App., 522 (1880); (4) Leslie v. Lorillard, 110 N. Y., 519 (1888); (5) Manchester and Lawrence Railroad v. Concord Railroad, 20 Atlantic R., 383 (1890); (66) National Company v. Hospital Company, 45 Minn., 275.

These decisions, however, have but little weight when carefully studied. They are only minor and temporary reverse currents which have lost their way in the general onward flow of the main stream.

Free competition is to fix prices in all cases except where the nature of the business renders it inoperative and creates a "virtual monopoly," and there the "police power" may be exercised (subject, however, to the provisions of the fifth and fourteenth amendments to the Constitution) in establishing "reasonable rates" or charges. (Granger cases, 94 U. S.; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S., 113; Railway Company v. Minnesota, 134 U. S., 418; Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S., 466; Budd v. New York, 143 U. S., 517; Spring Valley Water Works v. Schlotter, 110 U. S., 347.)

As confirmatory of the proposition expressed, there may be here introduced the testimony of two eminent jurists:

"The advantages of unrestricted competition are apparent to the public in industrial life all about us, and while in some kinds of business this is sharp, yet selfishness is sufficiently active and sufficiently intelligent to prevent its becoming ruinous." (Judge T. M. Cooley in Railway Review, January 8, 1887.)

"As long as the principle of competition by private contract is recognized by our social philosophy as regulative of industrial relations, the law has done all it can when, as with us, it breaks down the cast of hereditary privileges, sweeps away the law of primogeniture, and establishes that equality of opportunity which secures to every individual all that he can, according to his capacity, achieve and acquire for himself and his without infringing upon the equal right of his neighbor. The law can do no more than, as an impartial judge, keep a free and fair field, clear from all obstruction, and let the winner win." (Justice Matthews in New York Independent, July 10, 1879.)

As a summary of the benefits of free competition, see the remarkable article in Lalor's Cyclopedia of Political Science, Volume I, page 642, written by the eminent economist, Coquelin:

"We would not," it is remarked, "have the reader imagine that in what we have just said our object was to defend industrial or commercial competition against the puerile attacks which have so frequently been made on it. It has always seemed to us as ill-becoming economists to stoop to defend such a principle; it is too entirely inherent in the primary conditions of social life; it is at the same time too great, too elevated, too holy, and in its general application too far above the attempt of the pigmies who threaten it, to need any defense. We do not defend the sun, although it sometimes burns the earth, which it should only illuminate and warm; neither is there any need to defend competition, which is to the industrial world what the sun is to the physical world. Competition was not born in 1789; it was born in the very cradle of human society, which it has led step by step, from its state of primitive barbarity, to the point of civilization which it has now reached."

It may be truthfully stated that where competition is free no person, natural or artificial, can gain an advantage over others except by rendering more effective and efficient service to the community in quality, quantity, or time, or in some of these combined, unless resort be had to force or fraud.

The Eastern Railroad Association has, by its "combined force and power" and by fraud, for more than twenty-five years oppressed and robbed inventors and owners of patents. Since July 2, 1890, it has existed and pursued its iniquity, in violation of the antitrust act. It is unquestionably the duty of the Attorney-General, as directed by section 4 of the act, to instruct the proper district attorney forthwith to file a petition in equity praying that further violations of the law be enjoined and prohibited.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL, INDEPENDENT OF HIS POWER AND DUTY AS SPECIFIED UNDER SECTION 4 OF THE ANTITRUST ACT AND REPRESENTING THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES, HAS AUTHORITY TO AND SHOULD INSTITUTE SUIT IN EQUITY FOR THE PURPOSE OF RESTRAINING THE EASTERN RAILROAD ASSOCIATION.

The United States can assert its prerogative of parens patriæ and enter suit in its own courts in behalf of the public when there is an interference with the exercise of any exclusive power or function granted by the Constitution and over which the Congress by positive enactments has assumed control. (In re Debs, 158 U. S., 599; United States v. American Bell Telephone Company, 159 U. S., 670.)

The legislative branch of the Government vested with power and authority granted by Article I, section 8, paragraph 8, of the Constitution has enacted certain patent laws.

Patent rights are granted under the Federal Constitution and necessarily for the promotion of a Federal purpose. (Grant v. Raymond, 6 Peters, 218, 241; Ames v. Howard, 1 Sumner, 482; Blanchard v. Sprague, 3 Sumner, 535.)

In People ex rel Edison Illuminating Company v. The Assessors (156 N. Y. R., 417), the court remarked:

"The next step is that patent rights being created under the Federal Constitution and laws for a Federal purpose, the States are without the right to interfere with them."

A State has no power to obstruct or impose conditions upon or to interfere with the sale of State, county, or town rights or individual licenses under a United States patent. (Ex parte Robinson, 2 Biss., 209; Holliday v. Hunt, 70 Ill., 109; Helm v. First National Bank, 43 Ind., 167; Patterson v. Kentucky, 97 U. S., 501; Webber v. Virginia, 103 U. S., 304, etc.)

Regarding an interference with interstate commerce the Supreme Court, in re Debs (158 U. S., 564), expressed itself as follows:

"If a State with its recognized power of sovereignty is impotent to obstruct interstate commerce, can it be that any mere voluntary association of individuals within the limit of that State has a power which the State itself does not possess?"

By parity of reasoning a voluntary association of railroad corporations in fifteen States has no lawful authority to erect a "judicial tribunal" for the determination of all questions "respecting patented inventions in any way relating to railroads." (See p. 10.)

The executive branch of the Government must guard the Constitution and enforce the laws. The President "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." (Constitution, Article II, section 3.)

By act of Congress certain Executive Departments have been created to aid the President in the performance of his duties and to act by his authority.

The circuit courts, a part of the judicial branch of the Government, have jurisdiction of actions to which the United States is a party (18 U. S. Stat., 470, act March 3, 1875), and can exercise their equity jurisdiction at the suit of the Attorney-General, to prohibit acts which interfere with any subject-matter over which Congress, by power granted, has assumed control, and to restrain or annul obstructions interposed by private persons or corporations in the way of the full and free exercise of privileges lawfully granted by said legislative branch of the Government. (In re Debs, 158 U. S., 599; United States v. A. B. T. Co., 128 U. S., 359.)

Justice Brewer, in re Debs, summed up the conclusions of the court in a case involving an interference with interstate commerce by a voluntary association. Substituting for the clauses thereof relating to commerce among the States those relating to the promotion of useful arts by patents for inventions, the decision reads:

"Summing up our conclusions, we hold that the Government of the United States is one having jurisdiction over every foot of soil within its territory, and acting directly upon each citizen; that while it is a government of enumerated powers, it has within the limits of those powers all the attributes of sovereignty; that to it is committed power 'to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited time to * * * inventors the exclusive right to their * * * discoveries;' 'that the powers thus conferred upon the National Government are not dormant, but have been assumed and put into practical exercise by the legislation of Congress; that in the exercise of those powers it is competent to remove all obstructions,' 'natural or artificial,' to the progress of science and useful arts and to the free exercise by every citizen of the privileges guaranteed under the patent laws; that while it may be competent for the Government (through the executive branch and in the use of the entire executive power of the nation) to forcibly remove all such obstructions, it is equally within its competency to appeal to the civil courts for an inquiry and determination as to the existence and character of any alleged obstructions, and if such are found to exist, or threaten to occur, to invoke the powers of those courts to remove or restrain such obstructions; that the jurisdiction of such courts to interfere in such matters by injunction is one recognized from ancient times and by indubitable authority; that such jurisdiction is not ousted by the fact that the obstructions are accompanied by or consist of acts in themselves violations of the criminal law; that the proceeding by injunction is of a civil character."

And the court further stated that its decision in this case rested upon "broader ground" than the antitrust act.

See the following authorities:

The United States may bring an injunction bill, in the proper circuit court, to protect improvements which she is making under the authority of Congress in navigable waters from injury which will be caused by works of internal improvement within State limits and by [a] Ex parte Koehler, 21 Am. and English Rid. Cas., 57. But pooling is now forbidden by the interstate-commerce act.

State authority. (United States v. City of Duluth et al., 1 Dillon, 469 (1870).)

According to the principles of equity, as recognized in the courts of the United States, a State can obtain relief by a bill in equity filed by the attorney-general of the State. (Coosaw Mining Company v. South Carolina, 144 U. S., 564 (1892), citing United States v. Gear, 3 Howard, 120, and City of Georgetown v. Alexandria Canal Company, 12 Peters, 91.)

When a corporate excess of power tends to the public injury or to defeat public policy, it may be restrained in equity at the suit of the Attorney-General. (Stockton v. Central Railroad Company, 50 N. J. Eq. Rep., 52 (1892).)

"Remedies against corporations—bill by Attorney-General to prevent corporations from entering into agreements and combinations to prevent competition or monopolize trade, or for continuing in, or carrying out, such agreements and combinations." (Note to People v. Milk Exchange, page 485 of American Railroad and Corporation Reports, Volume XI.)

"When the managing body are doing or about to do an ultra vires act of such a nature as to produce public mischief, the Attorney-General, as the representative of the public and of the Government, may maintain an equitable suit for preventive relief." (Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence, sec. 1093. See also the last paragraph of the decision, United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association, 166 U. S., 290.)

The unlawful agreement relating to patents for inventions entered into by the railroad corporations of the fifteen Atlantic coast States under the style of the Eastern Railroad Association, and the many unlawful acts of the association in enforcing its unlawful agreement are fully set forth in the foregoing statement and accompanying exhibits.

The Attorney-General should, independent of his duty as designated in the antitrust act, direct the filing of a civil information in equity in the proper United States circuit court praying for an injunction to issue restraining the Eastern Railroad Association and for a dissolution of the unlawful trust combination and conspiracy.

EXHIBIT C.

Constitution and by-laws of the Eastern Railroad Association, adopted December 4, 1878.

CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

This association shall be called "The Eastern Railroad Association." While having for its general purpose the promotion of the railway interests, its leading object shall be the protection of its members against unjust claims made for patented inventions.

ARTICLE II.

This association shall be composed of railroad companies of New England, and any others, at the discretion of the executive committee, subscribing to the articles and contributing to the expenses of the association, each company to be represented by a duly authorized person.

ARTICLE III.

SECTION 1. The affairs of the association shall be managed by an executive committee of nine members, who shall be elected every year at the annual meeting of the association. They shall submit at each annual meeting of the association a report of the operations of the past year and of its financial condition, and any member of said committee, ceasing to be the representative of the company for which he is appointed, shall cease to be a member of said committee.

SEC. 2. Said committee shall organize by the election of a chairman, secretary, and treasurer—the chairman and treasurer to be selected from its own members—who shall also be president, secretary, and treasurer of the association. A majority shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. They shall also appoint such standing committees as they may deem requisite.

SEC. 3. Said committee shall provide a suitable place for the general office of the association, where all models, books, papers, and documents may be deposited for safe keeping.

SEC. 4. Said committee shall have power to elect such other officers and employees and appoint such legal counsel as may be necessary for the interests of the association, and fix their compensation; shall fill vacancies in its membership and make by-laws for its own government.

SEC. 5. Meetings of the executive committee may be called at any time by the chairman, or shall be when requested by any two members of the committee.

ARTICLE IV.

SECTION 1. The annual meeting of the association for the election of the executive committee and for the transaction of other business shall be held on the second Wednesday in May, at such hour and place as may be designated by the executive committee, and the fiscal year of the association shall terminate on the 31st of December.

SEC. 2. Special meetings of the association shall be called by the president, upon the request of two members of the executive committee, or at the written request of the representatives of not less than five companies.

SEC. 3. The representatives of ten companies shall constitute a quorum at all meetings of this association. Each company shall be entitled to one vote.

ARTICLE V.

SECTION 1. It shall be the duty of the president to preside at all meetings of the association. In the absence of the president a president pro tempore may be appointed. The presiding officer shall name or appoint all special committees, unless otherwise ordered by the association, and the president shall be ex officio member of all committees.

SEC. 2. The Secretary shall keep the minutes of the association, have charge of the models, archives, and the property not belonging to the finances of the association; he shall give his time exclusively to its service, and receive therefor such salary as the executive committee may fix.

He shall notify each company of any meeting of the association, by written or printed notice, at least ten days before such meeting. He shall answer all inquiries from members of the association relative to patent matters, and furnish them with written information regarding patents or patent claims that may be in possession of the executive committee. He shall also perform such duties in examining the validity of patents, and preparing cases for defense before the courts, and such other duties as the executive committee may direct. And, in order that this association may become more extended in its usefulness, it shall be the duty of the secretary to collect information relative to American railway operating, and distribute the same as may be directed by the executive committee.

SEC. 3. The treasurer shall collect all assessments as made by the executive committee, and disburse all the moneys of the association, under the direction of the executive committee, to whom he shall report as often as required, and at the annual meetings of the association shall submit a statement showing its financial condition, with a detailed exhibit of the receipts and expenditures of the past year.

ARTICLE VI.

SECTION 1. Whenever, in the opinion of the executive committee, a patent submitted for examination by any member is valid, or whenever it is deemed inexpedient to contest any claim made upon a member of the association for the use of a patented invention, it shall be the duty of said committee, at the request of any of the associate members, to negotiate either for the use of said patent, or for a settlement of the claim preferred, and when effected, to report the same to each associate member for acceptance.

SEC. 2. If any member declines accepting the basis of settlement so offered (and a failure to acknowledge receipt of said notice for fifteen days after its date shall be deemed an assent to the terms thereof), the association shall not be responsible for the defense of any suit, or for the expenses of any litigation against that company, and growing out of that case, incurred subsequent to date of said notice.

SEC. 3. Whenever a suit is brought against any member of the association for infringing upon a patent reported upon as invalid, or whenever a claim is made against any member for the use of a patent reported upon as valid, and for which a basis of settlement has been agreed upon as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of that member to make report of such suit or claim to the secretary, and thereafter the said committee shall manage the same at the expense of the association: Provided, The member so reporting has not previously declined, or shall not subsequently decline, such basis of settlement as has been, or may be recommended by the executive committee.

SEC. 4. Members of the association shall not settle any suit or claim against them after being advised by the secretary that a similar suit or claim is in charge of the association for defense in behalf of any of its members, without the consent of the secretary, indorsed by the president.

ARTICLE VII.

Any member willfully violating these articles may be stricken from the roll of membership by a vote of two-thirds of the members present, at any annual or special meeting, provided due notice of such proposed action shall be given in the call of said meeting.

ARTICLE VIII.

The chairman of the executive committee shall confer with the officers of similar railroad associations in the United States in relation to the settlement of patent claims and the trial of patent cases, and said committee may, if they deem it advisable, contribute from the funds of the association to aid in the defense of any patent case the issue of which involves the interests of the members of the association.

ARTICLE IX.

The executive committee shall have the power, and it shall be their duty, from time to time, as often as they judge the interests of the association require, to make assessments upon members of the association, one-half, as nearly as practicable, in proportion to their gross receipts for the fiscal year preceding the making of the assessment, and one-half in proportion to the length of their roads, for any expenses already incurred or hereafter to be incurred, which, in the opinion of the committee, should be borne by this association; and each of the companies, members of said association, does hereby severally agree with the treasurer of said association when said assessment is made to pay him the sum so assessed upon it, and that said treasurer may maintain an action in his own name against each of said companies severally for the assessment as aforesaid made upon it.

ARTICLE X.

Any company may withdraw from this association by giving notice in writing to the secretary, provided such company shall nevertheless be liable for its proportion of the expenses of the association for the fiscal year ending December 31 next ensuing.

ARTICLE XI.

This constitution may be altered or amended by a vote of two-thirds of the members present at any regular or special meeting, provided due notice of said proposed alteration or amendment shall have been given in notice for said meeting.

BY-LAWS.

ARTICLE I.

The annual meeting of the association and the election of an executive committee shall be held in the city of New York, and the stated meetings of the executive committee shall be held on the second Wednesdays of the months of March, May, September, and December, in each year, at such place and hour as the committee may from time to time designate; special meetings of the executive committee shall be called in the same manner as provided in constitution for the meetings of the association.

ARTICLE II.

The general office of the association shall be located, until further action by this committee, at Boston, Mass.

ARTICLE III.

The executive committee shall, at their first meeting after election, organize by electing from their own number a chairman and a treasurer, a secretary and general agent, not members of the committee, and also a finance committee, to be composed of three members of the executive committee. All elective officers shall serve for the ensuing year, or until their successors be elected.

ARTICLE IV.

Five members of the committee shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, which shall be in the following order:

1. Minutes of the last meeting read.
2. Report of treasurer.
3. List of applications made since last meeting.
4. Report of secretary.
5. Miscellaneous business.
6. Unfinished business.
7. New business.

ARTICLE V.

SECTION 1. The finance committee shall have charge of the finances of the association, and shall authorize all investments, and annually audit the accounts of the treasurer.

SEC. 2. The chairman shall preside at all meetings of the executive committee, preserve order and regular debate, according to parliamentary rules, and appoint all committees, unless otherwise ordered by the committee. In the absence of the chairman, a chairman pro tempore may be appointed. The chairman shall be ex officio a member of all committees.

SEC. 3. The Secretary shall have charge of the models, books, papers, and documents of the executive committee and of the association, excepting those in charge of the treasurer; and no original paper or report shall be taken from the office without the consent of the executive committee; he shall be present at all meetings of the executive committee, take minutes of the proceedings and record the same in a suitable book for that purpose. He shall notify the members of all regular and special meetings at least ten days prior to each meeting, and shall answer all inquiries from members of the association relative to patent matters by furnishing such important information as may be in possession of the committee; make such examinations and investigations and collect such information and testimony as may be necessary for the proper action of the executive committee or for conducting a suit in the interests of the association; he shall report at each stated meeting a list of applications submitted since the last meeting and make such reports thereon as have been prepared, and may send to members applying therefor any report that has been prepared for the action of the executive committee, but not submitted, with the understanding that said report is of no effect unless approved by the said committee. He shall, whenever the necessity for outside counsel may arise, submit to the executive committee the names of parties to be engaged and the rates at which such services may be obtained; but no engagement therefor shall be binding unless approved by the president. He shall prepare and submit to the executive committee, at its stated meeting in March of each year, a report of the operations of the association for the past year, showing the applications made, from whom and date of report thereon, and also the status of any suits that may be in progress. He shall, by and with the consent of the committee, appoint a clerk to perform such duties connected with the association as he may direct.

SEC. 4. The treasurer shall keep a regular set of books, containing the accounts of the association and of all the funds that may pass through his hands, and keep a separate account as treasurer at such bank or banks as the executive committee may approve. He shall make a report at each stated meeting of the executive committee of his receipts and disbursements in such form as the said committee may direct, and at the stated meeting in March shall submit a general statement of the financial condition of the association and a detailed statement of receipts and expenditures of the past fiscal year, duly audited by the financial committee. All payments shall be made by orders on the treasurer, audited by the secretary and approved by the president.

SEC. 5. The general agent shall, under the supervision and direction of the secretary, investigate and report on all patent questions as submitted by members of the association, and in contested cases shall prepare for defense. He shall note application for new patents and the extension of old ones. He shall furnish such information through the secretary as will enable the executive committee to reply to the inquiries of correspondents touching patent matters and to act intelligently in adjusting patent claims.

ARTICLE VI.

No alteration or amendment shall be made in these by-laws until presented at a stated meeting and adopted at a subsequent meeting by a majority of the whole committee.

REPORT.

OFFICE OF THE EASTERN RAILROAD ASSOCIATION,
Boston, Mass., March 24, 1879.

To the Members of the Eastern Railroad Association:

GENTLEMEN: In submitting this the twelfth annual report, your committee congratulates the members on the continued prosperity of the association. On referring to the reports of the secretary and treasurer herewith, it will be seen, from the details of the business transactions therein set forth, that the association has proved of increased usefulness to its members, while financially its condition is very satisfactory.

Your committee also congratulates the members on the successful results of the litigation assumed by the association on their behalf, as noted in that part of the secretary's report devoted to this the most important branch of the business of the association. In view of the results obtained in this respect your committee is fully impressed with the conviction that very large sums of money have been saved to the members, and to railroads generally, by the determined and persistent opposition made to what was believed to be "unjust claims for patented inventions." In this regard it must be a matter of great satisfaction to the members to know that no case which has been opposed by the association has yet been decided against them on final adjudication to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Since the last annual meeting several important changes have occurred which call for particular notice.

With much regret your committee accepted the resignation of Messrs. Isaac Hinckley as president, D. L. Harris as secretary, and John B. Winslow as treasurer. The resignation of these gentlemen, who so long and so ably filled their responsible positions, is felt to be a great loss; but we have the satisfaction of knowing that, while unable longer to continue the active duties of their former positions, they still take a deep interest in the welfare of the association, and continue to aid in its administration by their valuable counsel.

We have also to note the resignation of S. M. Whipple, esq., who has heretofore acted as expert and general agent of the association, to investigate and report on patent claims, and to prepare for defense in contested cases.

Under the new constitution such services require to be performed under supervision of the secretary, and form part of his duties. It is therefore believed that, with the addition to the clerical force of the secretary's office already made, the office of expert and general agent as heretofore existing may be dispensed with. Several important changes have been effected by the amended constitution, which, after due discussion and deliberation, was adopted at the special meeting of the association on the 4th day of December, 1878.

Copies of the amended constitution, and also of the by-laws, were forwarded to the members, and their representatives have doubtless made themselves familiar with the same.

Your committee, however, think it proper to refer to some of the provisions of the constitution as amended.

Particular attention is called to Article VI, which is designed to regulate the action of all concerned when a claim is made for the use of a patented invention and said claim is submitted to the association for action.

Section 1 of this article makes it the duty of the executive committee to negotiate with an inventor or patentee whose claim it is considered inexpedient to contest; but attention is drawn to the fact that the committee must first be requested to do so by a member. In this respect the section differs from section 3 or Article VII of the old constitution.

Section 2 is substantially the same as section 4 of Article VII of the old constitution; but it will be observed that if a member fails to acknowledge receipt of notice sent by the committee for fifteen days after its date, the terms of settlement proposed shall be considered as accepted by such member.

Attention is also called to section 3 of this article, as by its terms the members, in order to avail themselves of the services of the association for defense, or in settlement of claims, must notify the secretary of any suit or claim brought against them. And if any member has previously declined, or shall subsequently decline, the basis of settlement recommended by the executive committee, the association will not be responsible for any expenses for litigation such member may incur.

Section 4 prohibits any member settling any suit or claim brought against it, after being advised by the secretary that a similar suit or claim is in charge of the association for defense in behalf of any of its members, without the consent of the secretary, indorsed by the president.

This provision of the constitution may appear tyrannical, and it does to a certain extent deprive members of the liberty of individual and independent action in the settlement of claims; but the subject has been well considered, and the rule is believed to be essential to the successful carrying out of the main object of the association, to wit, the protection of its members against unjust claims made for patented inventions.

One member may find it expedient to settle a claim under special inducements; but the money thus paid enables the party making the unjust claim to prosecute other members, which in most cases he would otherwise be unable to do. Again, the weaker members of the association might be unduly influenced in the settlement of such claims when they learned that a more powerful member had found it expedient to settle.

Such methods of influencing the settlement of claims are well known to those engaged in the manipulation of fraudulent patent claims, and, if allowed to prevail, the influence and salutary effect of the association would be destroyed. To obtain the best results, the members of the association must act as a unit, and it is believed that this unity of action has been the true cause of our success heretofore.

Your committee also think it proper to direct attention to the fact that by the amended constitution the duties and responsibilities of the secretary's office have been increased (see section 2, Article V). One of the objects sought to be attained by extending the duties of the secretary so as to include the management of litigated cases was economy. Heretofore the executive committee, as a matter of necessity, had to employ counsel whenever suits were brought against any of the members and pay whatever bills were presented without full knowledge of the actual services rendered. As a remedy for this unsatisfactory state of affairs it was thought advisable to employ as secretary an attorney having experience in the practice of the patent law and who could, if necessary, practice in any of the United States courts having jurisdiction in patent cases. For particulars respecting the present method of carrying on the business of the association, we refer to the accompanying report of the secretary.

On referring to said report, it will also be found that the secretary is prepared to furnish information respecting several subjects not specially inquired of, but of general interest to the members, such as the early histories of the "electric telegraph," "power brakes," "sleeping cars," etc.; but as the regular duties of his office have proved onerous, it is not to be expected that he can give much attention to the collection of such general information. It is therefore suggested that when anything of interest in this connection comes to the knowledge of any members, the same be communicated to the secretary, so that, under the direction of your committee, he may be enabled to distribute such information to the other members.

We also call attention to the suggestions of the secretary as to the formation of a scientific library by voluntary donations of spare books by the members, to which end your committee have appropriated a limited amount to secure a complete set of the drawings of patents relating to railroads, and such reports on patent cases as will materially aid in carrying out the objects of the association, as well as to the importance of collecting models with a view to the formation of a museum of inventions. Your attention is particularly called to the means suggested to prevent the grant of fraudulent patents.

Recent developments show that our members can not be too careful when taking a license to see that the language of the agreement or license affords them proper protection in the use of the patented invention for which the license is given; and in this connection the following suggestions may be acceptable:

1. Be sure that the party who gives the license has a legal title to the patent. This can be ascertained by making application to the Commissioner of Patents for a certified abstract of the assignments of the particular patent for which the license is to be given.

2. Be sure that the license covers the right to use the invention, any improvements thereon which the inventor may have made and patented, or for which patents may hereafter be obtained by the inventor or his assignees.

3. Be sure that the license covers the right to use the patented device, not only on your own roads, but on any roads and branches which may be leased, or otherwise connected therewith, during the life of the patent or patents.

4. Be sure that the license covers the right to use the patented device during the entire period for which letters patent are or may be granted or extended, including any reissue of the same.

Attention is respectfully called to the resolutions adopted at the meeting of your committee, December 4, 1878, a printed copy of which was sent to the members at that time. Said resolutions are to the effect that the association can not, under the Constitution, undertake to defend the members against claims for infringement of letters patent until said claims have been examined and reported on by the executive committee; so that when suits are brought previous to such examination and report, the expenses incurred in defending the suit must be borne by the individual members sued unless said suit, upon examination, be accepted by the executive committee, in which case all expenses will be assumed by the association.

This does not prohibit the secretary from giving all the information on the subject at issue which may be in his possession, or from rendering aid in the proper defense of such suit prior to the action of your committee. Such services are at all times available to the members, but anything that may be done or any expense that may be incurred is subject to the approval of the executive committee.

On referring to the report of the treasurer, it will be found that the account up to December 31, 1878, stands as follows:

Balance from preceding year	$17,958.44
Collections under assessments	17,819.85
Collection of interest	460.00
Total	36,238.29
Less expenditures	15,678.21
Balance	20,560.08

Respectfully submitted.

By order of the executive committee:

STRICKLAND KNEASS, President.

EXHIBIT F.

Constitution and by-laws of the Eastern Railroad Association, now in force.

CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

This association shall be called "The Eastern Railroad Association." While having for its general purpose the promotion of the railway interests, its leading object shall be the protection of its members against unjust claims made for patented inventions.

ARTICLE II.

This association shall be composed of railroad companies of New England and any others, at the discretion of the executive committee, subscribing to the articles and contributing to the expenses of the association, each company to be represented by a duly authorized person; but no railroad company whose earnings are mainly derived from the transportation of passengers upon an elevated railroad within the limits of a city shall be admitted as a member of the association, except upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the executive committee.

ARTICLE III.

SECTION 1. The affairs of the association shall be managed by an executive committee of nine members, who shall be elected every year at the annual meeting of the association. They shall submit at each annual meeting of the association a report of the operations of the past year and of its financial condition, and any member of said committee ceasing to be the representative of the company for which he is appointed shall cease to be a member of said committee; and in all cases where a member of the executive committee is absent from two consecutive stated meetings of said committee, unless such absence is caused by sickness or absence from the country, it shall be equivalent to a resignation of said member, and it shall be the duty of the executive committee to fill the vacancy thus created at the next stated meeting following.

SEC. 2. Said committee shall organize by the election of a president, vice-president, general counsel, secretary, and treasurer (the president, vice-president, and treasurer to be selected from its own members), who shall also be president, vice-president, general counsel, secretary, and treasurer of the association. A majority shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. They shall also appoint such standing committees as they may deem requisite.

SEC. 3. Said committee shall provide a suitable place for the general office of the association, where all models, books, papers, and documents may be deposited for safe-keeping.

SEC. 4. Said committee shall have power to elect such other officers and employees, and appoint such legal counsel, as may be necessary for the interests of the association, and fix salaries and compensation, and prescribe the duties of all officers, agents, and employees; shall fill vacancies in its membership, and make by-laws for its own government.

SEC. 5. Meetings of the executive committee may be called at any time by the president, or shall be when requested by any two members of the committee.

ARTICLE IV.

SECTION 1. The annual meeting of the association for the election of the executive committee and for the transaction of other business shall be held on the second Wednesday in May, at such hour and place as may be designated by the executive committee, and the fiscal year of the association shall terminate on the 31st of December.

SEC. 2. Special meetings of the association shall be called by the president upon the request of two members of the executive committee, or at the written request of the representatives of not less than five companies. Notice of any meeting of the association shall be given by a written or printed notice directed to each member and deposited in the post-office at least ten days prior to the day of such meeting.

SEC. 3. The representatives of ten companies shall constitute a quorum at all meetings of this association. Each company shall be entitled to one vote.

ARTICLE V.

SECTION 1. Whenever, in the opinion of the executive committee, a patent submitted for examination by any member is valid, or whenever it is deemed inexpedient to contest any claim made upon a member of the association for the use of a patented invention, it shall be the duty of said committee, at the request of any of the associate members, to negotiate either for the use of said patent, or for a settlement of the claim preferred, and, when effected, to report the same to each associate member for acceptance.

SEC. 2. If any member declines accepting the basis of settlement so offered (and a failure to acknowledge receipt of said notice for fifteen days after its date shall be deemed an assent to the terms thereof), the association shall not be responsible for the defense of any suit or for the expenses of any litigation against that company, and growing out of that case, incurred subsequent to date of said notice.

SEC. 3. Whenever a suit is brought against any member of the association for infringing upon a patent reported upon as invalid, or whenever a claim is made against any member for the use of a patent reported upon as valid, and for which a basis of settlement has been agreed upon as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of that member to make a report of such suit or claim to the secretary, and thereafter the said committee shall manage the same at the expense of the association, provided the member so reporting has not previously declined, or shall not subsequently decline, such basis of settlement as has been or may be recommended by the executive committee.

SEC. 4. Members of the association shall not settle any suit or claim against them after being advised by the general counsel that a similar suit or claim is in charge of the association for defense in behalf of any of its members without the consent of the general counsel, indorsed by the president.

SEC. 5. Whenever the executive committee shall adopt a report relating to a patent, and shall not deem it for the best interests of the association to assume or continue the expenses of litigation growing out of such report, it may at its discretion so notify the member to whom such report is made, and the association shall not hereafter be at any legal or other expense on account thereof; but said committee may compromise and settle the claim or purchase a license for such member at the expense of the association: Provided, That in the opinion of said committee such settlement or purchase can be effected at less expense to the association than the cost of carrying on the litigation in behalf of such member.

ARTICLE VI.

Any member willfully violating these articles may be stricken from the roll of membership by a vote of two-thirds of the members present at any annual or special meeting, provided due notice of such proposed action shall be given in the call of said meeting.

ARTICLE VII.

The president of the executive committee shall confer with the officers of similar railroad associations in the United States in relation to the settlement of patent claims and the trial of patent cases, and said committee may, if they deem it advisable, contribute from the funds of the association to aid in the defense of any patent case the issue of which involves the interests of the members of the association.

ARTICLE VIII.

The executive committee shall have the power, and it shall be their duty from time to time, as often as they judge the interests of the association require, to make assessments upon members of the association, one-half, as nearly as practicable, in proportion to their gross receipts for the fiscal year preceding the making of the assessment, and one-half in proportion to the length of their roads, for any expenses already incurred or hereafter to be incurred, which, in the opinion of the committee, should be borne by this association. If any company shall neglect to make the proper returns called for by the treasurer after assessment is made, or neglect to pay the treasurer the sum assessed upon it before the 31st day of December thereafter occurring, it shall be deemed to be in default and shall not be entitled to the privileges of membership, and if it shall fail to pay the sum assessed upon it within three months after notice of default from the treasurer, it shall thereupon cease to be a member of the association.

ARTICLE IX.

Any company may withdraw from this association by giving notice in writing to the secretary, provided such company shall, nevertheless, be liable for its proportion of the expenses of the association for the fiscal year ending December 31 next ensuing.

ARTICLE X.

This constitution may be altered or amended by a vote of two-thirds of the members present at any regular or special meeting, provided due notice of said proposed alteration or amendment shall have been given in notice for said meeting.

BY-LAWS.

ARTICLE I.

The annual meeting of the association and the election of an executive committee shall be held in the city of New York, and the stated meetings of the executive committee shall be held on the second Thursday of the months of March, September, and December, and on the second Wednesday of the month of May in each year, at such place and hour as the committee may from time to time designate. Special meetings of the executive committee shall be called in the same manner as provided in the constitution for the meetings of the association.

ARTICLE II.

The general office of the association shall be located, until further action by this committee, at Washington, D. C.

ARTICLE III.

The executive committee shall, at its first meeting after election, organize by election from its own number a president, vice-president, and treasurer, a secretary and general counsel, not members of the committee, and also a finance committee, to be composed of three members of the executive committee. All elective officers shall serve for the ensuing year, or until their successors be elected.

ARTICLE IV.

Five members of the committee shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, which shall be in the following order:

1. Minutes of the last meeting read.
2. Report of treasurer.
3. List of applications for membership made since last meeting.
4. Report of general counsel.
5. Other business.
6. Reports on patents, etc.

ARTICLE V.

SECTION 1. It shall be the duty of the president or vice-president to preside at all meetings of the association. In the absence of the president or vice-president, a president pro tempore may be appointed. The presiding officer shall name or appoint all special committees, unless otherwise ordered by the association, and the president shall be ex officio a member of all committees.

SEC. 2. The vice-president, when called upon, shall assist the president in the performance of his duties, and during the absence or at the request of the president shall officiate in his place.

SEC. 3. The general counsel shall give his time exclusively to the service of the association, and receive therefor such salary as the executive committee may fix. He shall make all required examinations and reports as to scope and validity of letters patent and questions of infringement of same, and prepare cases for defense before the courts. He shall answer all inquiries from members of the association relative to patent matters and furnish them with written information regarding patents or patent claims that may be in the possession of the executive committee. He shall keep the minutes of the meetings of the association and of the executive committee, shall have charge of the office, models, archives, and property not pertaining to the investments or finances of the association, and perform such other duties as the executive committee may direct.

SEC. 4. The secretary shall give his time exclusively to the service of the association, and receive therefor such salary as the executive committee may fix. He shall keep the books of the association, excepting those in charge of the treasurer, shall notify the members and the executive committee of all meetings of their respective bodies. He shall have charge of the rooms of the office building in the city of Washington, D. C., not occupied by the association, rent same, collect the rents, and account to the treasurer therefor. He shall assist the general counsel and perform such duties as may be designated by him, and, in the absence of the general counsel, he shall take charge of the office, models, archives, and property not belonging to the finances of the association, and perform such other duties as the executive committee may direct.

SEC. 5. The treasurer shall collect all assessments as made by the executive committee, and disburse all the moneys of the association, under the direction of the executive committee. He shall keep a regular set of books containing the accounts of the association, and of all the funds that may pass through his hands, and keep a separate account as treasurer at such bank or banks as the executive committee may approve. He shall make report at each stated meeting of the executive committee of his receipts and disbursements in such form as the said committee may direct, and at the stated meeting in March shall submit a general statement of the financial condition of the association, and a detailed statement of receipts and expenditures of the past fiscal year, duly audited by the finance committee. All payments shall be made by orders of the treasurer, audited by the secretary, and approved by the president.

ARTICLE VI.

No alteration or amendment shall be made in these by-laws until presented at a stated meeting and adopted at a subsequent meeting by a majority of the whole committee.

STANDING RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved, That the secretary be instructed that in making reports to members, as directed by section 3, article 5, of the by-laws, previous to being submitted to the executive committee, he append thereto a printed notice to the effect that said reports are of no effect or binding upon the association until approved by the executive committee.

Adopted March 12, 1879.

Resolved, That the secretary be instructed to notify all railroad companies members of this association that hereafter all applications from such company asking for information from the association in regard to any patent device must be made through the president, vice-president, general manager, or superintendent of such company, or such officer or agent of said company as may be thereto specially authorized by resolution of the board of directors of said company.

Adopted March 10, 1880.

Resolved, That the executive committee be authorized to fix upon and establish an entrance fee that shall be chargeable to all companies desiring to connect themselves with the Eastern Railroad Association after this date, said entrance fee being intended to cover the proportional interest in funds of the association now invested.

Adopted at annual meeting, May 11, 1881.

Resolved, That it is not thought advisable for the association to introduce or, as an association, advocate legislation in Congress, but its members should promote any bill that may be offered to amend the patent laws so as to require the patentee or owner of a patent to give notice of any claim for infringement, and to commence suit thereon within a reasonable time after such notice is given.

Adopted December 14, 1881.

Resolved, That this association will, through its general counsel, furnish to any of its members any information it may be able to give in relation to the legal construction, effect, and bearing of any license or assignment made by the inventor or owner of any patent to one of the members, but, inasmuch as such licenses and assignments have been drawn or accepted by the officers or counsel of such members without action by or consultation with this association, the association can not properly take charge of or assume the expense of any litigation growing out of or connected with such licenses or assignments.

Adopted December 15, 1881.

Resolved, That the secretary notify all persons applying to the association for the privilege of making oral argument before the executive committee relating to patents that such privilege can not be granted, but that the executive committee will receive and consider any argument in writing that may be presented to it.

Adopted December 13, 1883.

Resolved, That in all future patent suits against members of this association the secretary be, and is hereby, instructed to require from the plaintiffs bonds or security for the costs, when such security can be legally demanded.

Adopted March 13, 1884.

In the matter of reports called for by members respecting inventions for which applications for patents are pending in the Patent Office,

On motion, it was—

Voted, That the general counsel be directed to notify the members making such inquiries that the association can not, consistently with its constitution and by-laws, give any advice or express any opinion in regard to any invention for which application for letters patent has been made and is pending in the Patent Office.

Adopted May 12, 1886.

Resolved, That the office of general counsel and secretary, created by resolution adopted May 12, 1880, be discontinued, and that the offices of a general counsel and a secretary be created in accordance with amendments to by-laws.

EXHIBIT G.

The following extracts from the technical journals represent the consensus of public opinion regarding the character of said Eastern Railroad Association, to wit:

[From the Railroad Car Journal, December, 1892.]

RIGHTS OF PATENTEES AND INVENTORS.

We have several times previously given space in this journal to the publication of the circumstances and proceedings in the suit of W. K. Tubman against the Wason Manufacturing Company for infringement of his patent. We have given unusual prominence to the case for the reason that it has brought up a much wider issue than the mere damage sustained by the owner of the patent—an issue of vital interest to inventors or owners of patented railroad appliances.

It would appear from the testimony that Tubman in his suit encounters a more formidable opponent than the actual defendants. He claims that the Eastern Railroad Association is maintaining the defense with the object of defeating his claim, and that with such an organization in existence, pursuing the methods it does, a poor inventor can not possibly hope to maintain his rights to a patented device which the association chooses to advise its members to use without the payment of royalty. The testimony, which we print in another column, of Mr. Andrew McCallum, the counsel of the association, can not be regarded as in any way rebutting the serious charges made against the association by Tubman. We quite fail to see why the proceedings of the Eastern Railroad Association should not be made public. The owner of a patent should certainly be entitled to learn the substance of the association's report to its members upon his invention; for railroads are becoming notorious by reason of the frequency with which they appropriate the ideas of inventors without compensation. The testimony in Tubman's case will be read with interest by inventors or owners of patents on railroad devices.

[From the World's Progress, March, 1892.]

APPROPRIATING PATENTS.

In another article in this issue we have discussed briefly the exercise of a practically assumed right by the Government to appropriate to its own use, without compensation, any patented article or invention it may please to want. That form of appropriation will have attention, and then will be duly regulated by law, just as soon as the abuse becomes so common as to produce public outcry. The sole reason why this law has not been made is that the number of those harmed is comparatively small. So far as the need in equity and justice for such a law is concerned, it seems to be commonly admitted that it is now urgent.

But there is another form of this appropriation which is more common, and consequently more aggravating. It is where a rich and powerful corporation deliberately takes and uses a patented device or invention and then says, coolly and impudently, to the patentee: "Help yourself, if you can." Then the issue so made is almost invariably governed by the length of the purse, and in the end the single-handed inventor finds himself outwinded by the long delays he can not prevent and the large expenses he is forced to pay to carry on his suit. We have now in mind a particular form of this organization that is accustomed to use any patented invention in the line of its business that it pleases to appropriate. We refer to the railroad associations, of which there is one at the east and one at the west. Ostensibly these associations are for self-protection against causeless litigation and the annoyance of importunate and unreasonable inventors. So far as this protective idea goes, the motive of these associations is very proper; but when these associations go further and assume the right to appropriate any invention they wish to use, and thus force the inventor into the courts to endeavor to get redress, these associations are all wrong.

The consequence is that the single-handed inventor rarely wins in any such suit. It must be said, in justice to these associations, that they allege that they always pay for the use of any and all really new and valuable improvements. But this assertion is hotly denied by the body of inventors who have, as they assert, been ruthlessly defrauded of their rights.

It seems to us that some law can be framed that will secure justice to both parties; that, on the one hand, will enable the inventor to contest his rights with some show of a fair trial, and, on the other, protect the parties who do not wish to be causelessly annoyed by every inventor who is willing, properly or improperly, to invoke the aid of the law. Under the new patent law in Germany a wanton infringement is made a criminal act. We do not say this is the way to deal in this country with the matter, but it is one way, and the existence of that law proves that the abuse of which we now write has already begun to attract deliberate attention. The attention of the House Committee on Patents has been called to the matter and an earnest attempt made to secure some legislation by Congress to prevent the alleged abuses.

[From the Scientific American, March 12, 1892.]

Legislation is certainly needed to put a stop to combinations formed like the Eastern Association for the express purpose of nullifying the privileges granted to inventors by Congress.

[From Locomotive Engineering for November, 1892. Angus Sinclair, editor, 912 Temple court, New York.]

PROPERTY RIGHTS IN PATENTS.

A decision was rendered last month by the United States court of appeals in a suit brought by the Edison Electric Light Company against the United States Electric Light Company that is of interest to many people who are not in any way concerned in proprietary rights in electrical appliances. Edison was the original inventor of the incandescent lamp, where light is produced by the electric current passing through a resisting medium inclosed in a vacuum. Several parties imitated this invention, and have been selling incandescent lamps which seemed to avoid the Edison patents. The court has now decided that every known form of incandescent lamp, and every possible form of this lamp, infringes the Edison patents.

This means practically that when an inventor secures a foundation patent for any device, the imitations which obtain the same results by different mechanical arrangements are infringements. The decision is a little more emphatic than several others previously made of the same tenor. The well-known decision on the Richardson safety-valve patents was substantially the same as that now rendered concerning electric lights.

This decision ought to be of direct interest to many railroad companies, for there is no class using mechanical appliances more given to patronizing articles that are notoriously pirated imitations of patents. The great variety of functions demanded of railway machinery presents an unparalleled field for inventive genius, and it is industriously cultivated. But no sooner does an inventor produce an appliance or improvement which promises to be in demand than there is a host of imitators doing their best to produce something which will do the same functions and avoid infringing the original patent. The principal work done by the mechanical engineers employed by some railroad companies is the designing of forms of patented articles which shall perform the functions of the original without incurring the liability to pay royalty. This is a small, mean business, and is nothing more than dishonesty; for it is stealing a man's ideas and dressing them so that their identity may be disguised.

The plain decisions of the courts ought to discourage this sort of industry. The only reason why railroad companies are not paying royalties on numerous patents that they are using illegitimately is the delay and expense that must be incurred in lawsuits for infringements of patents. Law's delays are so notoriously tedious in patent suits that those who have been injured patiently suffer wrong rather than engage in the long and expensive fight. We have recently heard of a movement among men of means to purchase the originals of patents that have been largely imitated by railroad companies. Should this be done some of the companies are likely to have to pay damages that will put the money paid to settle the Tanner brake suits far into the shade.[a]

That in the years 1877 and 1878 the said Eastern Railroad Association, in combination with a similar association in the West, endeavored to secure legislation in Congress which would enable the members of the association to appropriate patented inventions without being compelled to pay for them. The following selections from "Arguments before the Committees on Patents, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, Miscellaneous Document No. 50," represent the views of many reputable patent attorneys and others regarding the railroad combination to appropriate patent property, to wit:

W. C. Dodge, esq., Washington, D. C.:

"On the part of the railroads it is a demand that they shall be allowed to appropriate any invention they please, and then to have the law so changed as practically to prevent their being compelled to pay for them" (p. 69).

"Or, which of these public-spirited railroad companies now asking you to change the patent laws for their special benefit would invest their capital in building their roads if, when built, the dividends were to go into other pockets than their own?" (p. 70).

"That resolution was introduced by a member whose firm had been made to pay quite an amount in damages for the use of a patented invention which they had appropriated without leave or license of the owner; and it is a striking coincidence that this movement to change our laws was inaugurated by the railroad combination, who, as they tell you, have in like manner been mulcted in heavy damages for a similar appropriation of patented inventions, and which the owners would gladly have sold or licensed them to use for far less than the sum awarded by the courts. As proof of this it is stated that the owner of the swage block patent, for the use of which these companies complain they have been made to pay an exorbitant price—over $100,000—offered to let the same company have the use of his patent for the whole term for $1,000, which they agreed to pay, but when the papers were to be executed the company insisted on the party taking pay in bonds of the company, worth only 90 cents on the dollar, and because the owner of the patent refused to be thus swindled out of one-tenth of the price agreed upon they refused to complete the arrangement, and told him they would use it in spite of him, and he might help himself if he could. I submit that it does not become parties who have acted thus to now come here crying like a whipped schoolboy and ask Congress to change the law simply to relieve them from the consequences of their own willful violation of the law" (p. 72).

J. J. Storrow, esq., counsel for the Bell Telephone Company:

"There will be cases undoubtedly where defendants will willfully infringe patents. Nay, there will be cases where rich defendants will band themselves together and say to the patentee unless he will sell his invention to them at a price agreeable to them, that they will drag him for ten years through the courts at an expense which is a flea bite to them, but ruinous to him" (p. 135).

W. W. Hubbell:

"These railroad companies infringed a patent beyond all question, and they knew the inventor was poor and could not bring suits all over the United States against these different railroad companies, and they have taken a rule upon him for security for costs, and he, in his inability to furnish it, has been barred and thrown out of court. This was done over here in Baltimore. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company did that, to my knowledge, where they infringed a patent" (p. 153). (See standing resolution No. 7 in constitution.)

G. H. Christy, esq., counsel for Westinghouse Air Brake Company:

"I think, further, that it is a dangerous remedy to put into the hands of a wrongdoer, particularly if he is a wealthy party or corporation, and I use the word 'corporation' not in any ill sense, for it is one of the most honest and legitimate ways of carrying on business; but it is especially dangerous to give the power to seventy or eighty wealthy corporations to pounce down on an inventor and snatch from him all his just rights, as was the case with Goodyear, and reduce him to absolute beggary; and as was the case with Pullman when he was jacking up houses in Chicago; or as with Westinghouse, who was not able to pay me his first fee for his first caveat.

"Now, if it is good to put in the hands of an associated power representing such a consolidated amount of wealth, and with the unscrupulous character for which railroads are noted (I speak of it only as an entity, and not in regard to its officers)—I say it is a very dangerous thing to put such a grant of power into the hands of such an organization in order that they may sit down on and squelch an inventor without any money to fight them. Now, then, if I have got seventy or eighty railroad companies at the back of me with their capital and their employees, it is a very singular circumstance if I can not cook up some testimony among them.[b] I do not say that Brother Raymond would, but I do not know who his successor might be. It is putting a dangerous remedy in the hands of a most dangerous class—the wealthy part of our country, who want to use an invention without paying for it" (pp. 254, 255).

[b] In 1889 the association "reissued" a patent, with an added drawing, from its office on F street, in Washington. The reissue was then introduced in evidence for the purpose of securing a narrow construction of a patent claim.

Hon. Elisha Foote, ex-Commissioner of Patents:

"You might as well do directly what this section does indirectly, and pass an act that every railroad which is not making profits or dividends shall have the privilege of taking any patents they please with impunity; and, if you make the thing entirely consistent and rational, you should also say that they may enter upon anyone's land and cut their ties, and go into rolling mills and take their rails, or any other property they choose to take, and they shall have them without responsibility to anybody.

"Take the case of this Westinghouse brake, which, I understand, the patentee manufactures himself and puts onto cars at a very reasonable price. Now, suppose any of these Chicago railroads, making no money, should think it desirable for them to take and use this brake without paying anything for it. This section would undoubtedly authorize them to do so without any compensation, and they could grab any amount of property with impunity" (p. 413).

"What chance would the poor inventor have against these powerful corporations? None but a very wealthy person could enter into such a controversy. The roads would not need the other provisions of the bill. This would enable them to take and use any patent they please with impunity, and no one would dare to sue them" (p. 415).

"Suppose any of these wealthy corporations should call upon a poor inventor to commence a suit against them, and to encounter a big railroad combination with all their able and learned counsel in their employ? It would be impracticable; he would have to give up his patent" (p. 418).

Albert H. Walker, esq., author of Walker on Patents:

"Now suppose the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company see the wonderful invention, and think that is a good thing, and a good deal cheaper than coal, and say: 'We will proceed to infringe Mr. Vance's patent, and we will fight him ten or fifteen years, if he sues us, with the probable result of his exhausting his means before he gets a decree.' Such a course of defiant infringement is, in many cases, the deliberate purpose of railroad men. It was the avowed practice of H. E. Sargent, the superintendent for many years of the Michigan Central Railroad, and one of the members of the Western Railroad Association. He has avowed it as his universal principle never to pay anything voluntarily to a patentee. He says: 'Whenever our attention is called to a patent of value, we use it, and in a few cases we are made to pay, by plucky inventors; but, in the aggregate, we pay much less than if we took licenses at first.' I admit the railroad companies do not generally avow such a plan of action, but I know they entertain such ideas" (p. 396).

That the substance of the following article, which correctly sets forth the character, objects, and methods of the Eastern Railroad Association, was published in the Railway Age in 1891, to wit:

The Eastern Railroad Association should be broken up, because:

1. It is a secret society, with a secret constitution and by-laws, organized, not like most voluntary associations, for charity or mutual assistance in times of sickness, poverty, or distress, nor for moral or intellectual culture, nor for the promotion of science or the arts, nor for the advancement of man's estate, but, judged by its actions for many years, for the spoliation of the property of inventors. It has no charter. It does not report annually to any Commonwealth. Its right to exercise its franchises is a usurpation. It is not based upon any contract with the people of any State. It is an irresponsible body. It is organized selfishness.

2. It is a permanent conspiracy, inasmuch as its constitution requires unity of action by all its members in opposing individual patentees, and this whether each member (railroad) is directly interested or not in the particular controversy. It is well-established law that a combination to attain an end, even lawful in itself, constitutes a conspiracy when such combination subjects the individual to its combined and concentrated power.

3. The members of the association intermeddle in what is none of their business. The precepts of international law do not allow a disinterested nation to intermeddle in a contest between two other nations. Our National Government can not intermeddle with the local affairs of a State. The man who interferes with his neighbors' quarrels receives no sympathy if he gets his head broken. Boys in their sports cry: "Hands off!" "Fair play!" The courts have well-defined rules as to when and how interested parties may intervene in suits. But this association will not ask leave to intervene.

4. The association violates section 8, Article VIII, of the Constitution of the United States "to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to * * * inventors the exclusive right to their * * * discoveries."

Mr. W. S. Huntington, in the National Car Builder, some time ago, speaking of the eastern and western railroad associations, remarked: "The inventors are now practically in their power. Many inventors who had labored to improve railway appliances abandoned the field and exercised their ingenuity in other directions, where there were fewer obstacles."

5. It is a trust; the most powerful and wealthy trust in the United States—the Standard Oil is an infant beside of it—more powerful than any that has had being since the enactment of statute 21, James I, abolishing monopolies. This statute has been called the Magna Charta for British industries, and may equally be called the same for American, inasmuch as it established legitimate competition. "This statute," Hume said, "contained a noble principle and secured to every subject unlimited freedom of action, provided he did no injury to others nor violated statute law." This association closes the market against inventors and owners of patents, and prevents free competition.

6. It interferes with the administration of justice in the courts. Its methods are somewhat as follows: If a railroad wishes to use a patented invention, the matter is referred to the general counsel of the association. He investigates and sees what is most expedient to do. He ascertains whether the owner of the patent is a poor man, without means to bring a suit, or a wealthy and influential citizen; whether it is cheaper to pay a small license fee or to appropriate the invention and fight the owner through the court of last resort. If appropriated and the owner brings suit against the railroad infringer, the entire strength and means of the association are brought to bear to crush him, so as to terrify other patentees from bringing suit for the spoliation of their property, and every member of the association joins in the defense against him, whether using the invention or not. It closes the market against the patentee by the first report on his patent. Its constitution forbids any member paying anything to the owner, because such payment would serve to establish a measure of damages should the owner ultimately win his suit. In one of the association's reports the president exhorts the members to "act as a unit," and says: "This unity of action has been the true cause of our success heretofore." Its general counsel in 1879 boasted that the association had never been compelled to pay anything for infringement of letters patent. The seal of the United States on a patent has no significance in its eyes. The little building, 614 F street, is bigger than the United States Patent Office.

All suits against any member of the association are defended by its general counsel, who travels on passes while taking evidence and at all other times in defending the suit, and he avails himself of every means within his power per fas per nefas to defeat the suit. Delays, obstructions, manufactured evidence, appeals, and all sorts of trickery are resorted to as occasion demands.

If the complainant is finally successful he can seldom prove "profits" or "damages," and as his patent has generally expired before a final judgment is secured, an injunction will not issue. The complainant has been to great expense and trouble and, after having won his suit, can not collect a cent. It is "more expedient" and cheaper to pay costs than to take licenses in the first instance.[a]

The following boast was made by the association's general counsel, A. McCallum, in closing the thirteenth annual report to the members of the association, to wit, "It appears to be the fact that during the whole period of thirteen years, during which the association has been in existence, no suit defended by it has resulted in a judgment against a member on appeal to the highest court; and that while some claims have been settled after suit was brought, no member (railroad) defended by the association has yet, by process of law, under execution, attachment, or otherwise, been compelled to pay anything on account of infringement of letters patent."

Letters from Whitney, Olney, and Griggs.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., August 28, 1893.

WILLIAM K. TUBMAN, Esq., Baltimore, Md.

SIR: Your petition of August 18 in relation to the Eastern Railroad Association has received careful attention.

The facts stated in your petition, so far as material to the relief asked, are that you are bringing suit in the Federal courts in Connecticut and Pennsylvania, respectively, against two railroad companies for infringement of letters patent for an improvement in railway car windows; that these suits are being defended in the name of the defendant corporations by the Eastern Railroad Association; that one of the objects of this association is to combine all the railroad companies of this part of the country for the purpose of dealing with patentees, it being provided by the constitution of the association that negotiations with patentees should be carried on by the executive committee of the association; that no royalties should be paid, except with the consent of the executive committee, and that all suits for infringements should be defended by the association.

Your claim is that this combination is a violation of the antitrust law of July 2, 1890, and you ask me to direct the United States attorneys for the districts in which the suits are pending immediately "to institute proceedings in equity to restrain the Eastern Railroad Association from continuing in force against yourself the provisions of its constitution above referred to."

The antitrust law provides that every "contract, or combination in the form of a trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations" is illegal, and that every "person who shall monopolize or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize, any part of the trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations" is guilty of a misdemeanor. I do not think that the combination you refer to comes within the purview of the act.

A patentee is the owner of a monopoly of the right for seventeen years to the sole manufacture, use, and sale of the article which he has invented. In this instance the article invented is one that can only be used by railway companies. You are the only producer and they are the only consumers. You allege that all the possible consumers of the article in a certain territory combine against the sole producer for the purpose of preventing its price being raised above the figure which they are willing to pay. It may be that this combination abuses its power, and, as you aver, either reduces the royalty to a grossly inadequate figure or violates the patentee's rights altogether, relying upon its ability to tire him out in litigation. These evils, however, are not those which the antitrust law was enacted to remedy, and their redress must be found elsewhere. I do not think that a combination of present consumers of a given commodity effects restraint or a monopoly of trade or commerce within the meaning of the act.

Moreover, I do not perceive that you can not obtain, by proceedings in your own name, whatever remedy, if any, could be afforded by the suit you ask to be brought. It has been the opinion of this Department that the right of a person injured to sue for violation of the act of 1890 is not to be regarded as denied, because, by the express terms of the statute, the United States may initiate an equivalent proceeding. General considerations of public policy require that private parties with ample remedies for the redress of their alleged wrongs in their own hands are not to be encouraged to expect governmental interposition in their behalf. For these reasons the prayer of your petition must be denied.

Respectfully,

EDWARD B. WHITNEY,
Acting Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1893.

WILLIAM K. TUBMAN, Esq.,
Baltimore, Md.

SIR: Your communication of November 27, asking a reconsideration of your petition for the bringing of suit against the Eastern Railroad Association, under the antitrust law act of 1890, has received careful examination. I am unable to perceive, however, that the matter was not properly disposed of by the Acting Attorney-General in his letter of August 23 last.

The remarks of Congressmen quoted by you as to the depression of prices by middlemen in order that they may obtain an undue share of the profit between producer and consumer do not apply to combinations of the consumers themselves to obtain a reduction of prices. You do not refer to any authorities holding such combinations to be illegal in case of purely private sales; nor have I been able to find any.

Nor do I think that my refusal to direct suit in the name of the Government precludes you from relief. I am aware that the late Judge Billings decided last winter in a case in Louisiana that a private person could not sue for relief under section 4 of the act. His opinion, however, contains no reasons for the decision, and it does not appeal to my judgment, and I do not think that his decision alone should be controlling in a matter of so great magnitude. The Department of Justice has but a limited appropriation for maintenance of suits, and it has never been considered that the Attorney-General should commence suit except with the belief that he had a fair prospect of winning it. I do not think that Congress intended to conclude by the Attorney-General's opinion parties believing themselves to be injured.

In your communication you charge that officers of the Eastern Railroad Association are guilty of various acts which are crimes independent of the antitrust law. If you are possessed of evidence which will establish such crimes, it should be submitted to the district attorney for the proper district.

In acting upon your communications it has been assumed that you are the owner of a lawful patent which has been infringed by the railroad companies, although a Federal court has decided that you have no rights in the premises, a decision which might be held to dispose of your application.

Respectfully,

RICHARD OLNEY, Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., May 23, 1900.

F. E. STEBBINS, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In the matter of the application of William K. Tubman, requesting me to institute proceedings under the act of July 2, 1890, commonly known as the "antitrust law," against the Eastern Railroad Association, having waited a reasonable time for Hon. J. M. Wilson to appear, I must infer from his failure to appear that he does not care to add anything to the argument you have submitted, and I therefore proceed to dispose of the matter.

The complaint is that a large number of railroad companies have formed this association for the purpose of advising its members with respect to the purchase or use of railway patent rights and of assisting them in the defense of claims for the infringement of such patents. It is urged that patent rights are the subject of interstate commerce and that the association constitutes a combination in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States.

The same application has been twice made to the Department and twice denied, first by Acting Attorney-General Whitney, in a carefully considered communication under date of August 23, 1893, and afterwards by Attorney-General Olney, in his letter of December 11, 1893.

In addition to the considerations mentioned by them, the following are in point:

A patent right is essentially a monopoly. The patentee is granted the exclusive right, for a term of years, to make, use, or vend the patented article. This right is absolutely within his control. He may omit to use it himself and refuse to permit anybody else to use it. He may permit one person to use it and without assigning any reason refuse to permit another to do so. He may sell the right in parcels, giving one person license to use the patent in one place and another license to use it elsewhere.

Such being the nature of a patent right, may not the association complained of be considered as a reasonable and fair arrangement for the mutual benefit and protection of railroads in transactions relating to patents? Before a railroad company can safely purchase a patent right or use an invention it must be assured that the patent is valid and its use will not operate as an infringement. So, too, if a claim for infringement is made the company has a right before paying it to make a full investigation, and may do this individually or through others. In what way does it unlawfully interfere with the rights of the patentee for the railroads to create a board of experts which shall be furnished with all the information they have respecting patents, and to which shall be referred for investigation and report all questions relating to patents? A man who offers a patent for sale does not enter the open field of competition. If his patent is valid there can be no competition. The patent is a monopoly which no person can lawfully infringe, and which he can refuse to sell at all or sell for what he pleases. There is no competition to fix a reasonable price for patent rights. The patentee may demand a thousand or a million dollars. It is worth what he can get for it. If it is infringed, he has his remedy in the courts. If he makes a claim for damages because of infringement he can not object to the person or corporation threatened seeking advice and information from any source before paying or resisting it.

Another thing to be considered is, that to provide the safest service and to secure the best results railroads must be built and equipped in a uniform manner throughout the United States. Passengers and employees are alike interested in this, and Congress has recognized the need by requiring automatic couplers and other safeguards on interstate railroads. For these reasons a patented appliance for use on railroads may be of general concern, in which event one railroad can not safely adopt it without consulting the others. This of itself makes the creation of an association with a board of experts, to which patents may be referred for investigation and report, of exceptional propriety and benefit.

The application must therefore be denied.

Respectfully,

JOHN W. GRIGGS, Attorney-General.

This letter was written by Solicitor-General Richards and signed by Griggs, who prepared the answer to the bill in equity in the case of United States v. The Northern Securities Company et al.

EXHIBIT K.

OPINION OF WILLIAM E. CHANDLER, MARCH 24, 1902.

A combination of all or a large number of railroads to contest patents on all articles required for railroad use, in which each railroad agrees not to settle with any patentee without the consent of a committee of the combination, nor while any claim is pending against any other member of the combination, and by which the combination agrees to defend all suits against each railroad and to pay the expenses of such defense and pay any judgments which may be recovered, is an illegal conspiracy in restraint of trade under the act of Congress of July 2, 1890 (26 Stat., 209).

The object is to enable the combination to control and fix the prices to be paid as royalties upon all inventions, and does not allow each railroad to make its own settlements with the patentees. It is a conspiracy to get lower prices for what the combination buys, as contradistinguished from a conspiracy to get higher prices for what a combination produces and sells; and both are obnoxious to the law against monopolies.

Patents are property created by express national law. A patented article has attached to it a special value growing out of the patent. Congress having decided that it is for the public good that inventive genius shall be stimulated by patent monopolies, all patents and all patented articles are proper subjects of trade and commerce, and as such are protected by all the laws which protect other merchandise. If it is desirable that they shall exist it is desirable that there shall be unhindered trade therein, and such trade can not be lawfully lessened by combinations and conspiracies to diminish the value thereof through lawsuits, to fix the prices which shall be paid therefor, and to otherwise prevent free traffic therein.

The railroads can no more combine to fix low prices which they shall pay than an association of patentees can combine to fix high prices which they shall charge.

The fact that the patentees are for a limited period legal monopolists gives no right to the railroads to establish an illegal combination to limit the monopolies. Congress can abolish patents; the railroads can not.

All the above propositions seem clear and not doubtful. The facts in the case of the Eastern Railroad Association are all of record in their own books and reports, and are too plain to need recital. The association is formed expressly for the purpose above supposed, and for no other purpose. To be sure, it is stated that its object is only to resist illegal patents, but that recital does not change the avowed purpose to allow no patents to be settled for by any one member of the association except with the assent of a committee of all the railroads, and to defend any claims against any member and to pay the expenses and the judgment, if any is recovered. The Joint Traffic Association contended that its object was not to fix and maintain unreasonable rates, but only rates which should be reasonable. The subterfuge did not avail with the Supreme Court, and the subterfuge that the open combination of all the railroads to control the settlement for all patents is only intended to apply to illegal patents will be equally worthless.

It is difficult to believe that an illegal combination so plain and evident should have existed during all these thirty years last passed. It can not be doubted that the President and the Attorney-General, when they know the facts, will act with as much promptness and vigor as they have in the case of the Northern Securities Company, where the facts and the law are not so clear and plain as in the present case, because in the first the purpose is not stated in words, while in the latter it is openly and expressly avowed.

The foregoing opinion is given in full view of the letter of Acting Attorney-General E. B. Whitney, of August 23, 1893, and the letter of Attorney-General Olney of December 11, 1893. Those gentlemen were members of Mr. Cleveland's Administration, and, like Attorney-General Judson Harmon, were doubtless influenced in their poinion by their close relations to their President, of whom Mr. William J. Bryan, on March 21, 1902, spoke as follows:

"For four years he stood between the people and reform; for four years he made the White House the rendezvous of cunning and crafty representatives of predatory wealth; for four years the corporations and syndicates controlled his Administration."

Insensibly to themselves, perhaps, Mr. Whitney and Mr. Olney were controlled by surroundings like these, and Messrs. McKenna and Griggs mistakenly refused to reverse the decisions of their predecessors, doubtless overcome by the lingering malaria of the late Administration. But there is no such atmosphere now in the White House or in the Department of Justice. President Roosevelt and Attorney-General Knox are the friends of the people and reform, and not representatives or predatory wealth, and it is impossible that they should not suppress a combination so evidently illegal as that of the Eastern Railroad Association.

WM. E. CHANDLER.

EXHIBIT L.

OPINION OF UNITED STATES SENATOR TURNER.

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, D. C., May 17, 1902.

H. B. MARTIN, Esq.,
Secretary Antitrust League, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: From the papers submitted to me it appears that the Eastern Railroad Association is a trust formed by several hundred railway companies operating east of the Mississippi River, whereby each company contributes to a fund controlled by trustees, engages to be bound by the action of the trustees, and to do nothing whatever in the matters committed to the said trustees; and under and by virtue of the trust agreement the fund thus created is to be used by the trustees—

First. To investigate concerning the validity and utility of all patents granted for improvements and devices to be used in connection with the operation of the railways.

Second. To defend all suits brought by patentees against railways, members of the trust, for using any such improvements and devices.

Third. To compromise such suits when, in the opinion of the trustees, the patent is valid, provided the sum paid by the way of compromise be not more than it would cost to litigate the suits.

Fourth. When patent rights are found to be both valid and useful, to negotiate and purchase the same for the benefit of the members of the trust, and upon such terms as the trustees may determine.

The companies agree that they will not negotiate or deal with patentees either in the matter of purchase or by way of compromise for illegal use, but that all such negotiations and dealings shall be by the trustees. The effect of the agreement is far-reaching, as a moment's reflection will readily show, upon the value of the property of patentees and upon their ability to vend the same throughout the several States covered by the agreement. The patentees, as to all such States, are reduced to the necessity of dealing with a single purchaser. This purchaser is armed with a large fund to fight in the courts all patents which it can not purchase on its own terms. It is an impudent bully which takes any property that it pleases upon such terms as it pleases, and is armed with a club to beat its victims to death if they decline to submit.

Since the trust is interstate in its scope and operations, has for its object the restraint of trade in patent rights, is created by contract, has taken and maintained the trust form, and is, moreover, a criminal conspiracy at common law, thus presenting all the features denounced by Section I of the act of July 2, 1890, it necessarily follows that it is illegal if, first, a patent right is property which may be said to enter into and form a part of trade and commerce; and, second, if a combination to lower the value of property entering into interstate commerce is as much "in restraint of trade" within the meaning of the act of 1890, as a combination to raise the value of such property would be.

It does not require either profound consideration or an extended examination of authorities to see that the question of correctness of both the foregoing subjunctive propositions must be answered in the affirmative.

First. A patent right is property. It is created by statute, and the freedom of vending it in all the States is declared by statute. The fact that it is incorporeal in character and intangible does not change its character as property. Judge Davis, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in ex parte Robinson (2 Biss., 309), uses the following language concerning the character of patents and the free right to vend them within the United States:

"The property in inventions exists by virtue of the laws of Congress, and no State has a right to interfere with its enjoyment or to annex conditions to the grant. If the patentee complies with the laws of Congress on the subject he has the right to go into the open market anywhere within the United States and sell his property."

Inventions secured by patents have been specifically declared to be property by the Supreme Court of the United States in the following cases: Brown v. Duchesne, 19 Howard, 197; Cammeyer v. Newton, 94 U. S., 225; Densmore v. Schofield, 102 U. S., 375; Soloman v. United States, 137 U. S., 346.

Being property and the right to freely vend them in the several States being secured by statute, why are not patented inventions as much within the spirit and purpose of the act of 1890 as any other species of property? It is impossible to conceive of any reason why they are not. There is no such reason. Indeed, as to many tangible articles of property covered by patents, the patented idea involved in and connected with them constitutes a great part of their value, and in some instances the greater part. The protection which the law carries for such articles against combinations in restraint of trade therein is a protection for both the value of the articles considered simply as manufactured articles and the value of the patent right which inheres in and belongs to them. We see, then, that the law does include within its purview the patent right when connected with tangible physical property, and it is impossible to conceive why it should not be taken to include the patent right when disconnected with the tangible physical property.

Second. Is it not a combination to lower the value of property entering into interstate commerce "in restraint of trade" within the meaning of the act of 1890? The evil most in the public mind at the time of the passage of that act was the existence of trust combinations formed to increase the price of manufactured articles, but that combinations might be formed for the opposite purpose could not have escaped the intelligence of Congress, and that combinations and conspiracies had existed in the past for that purpose, and constituted indictable crimes at common law, was well known to the Members of both Houses. The terms of the act are general. They say "every contract, etc., in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States," etc. Since it is as much in restraint of trade to depress the value of articles of property as it is to enhance them, and indeed more so, and since the history of the law showed that conspiracies for the first purpose were as likely to occur as conspiracies for the second, and that they were equally as injurious as the second kind, it is impossible, in view of the broad and comprehensive language employed, to conclude that Congress did not have both kinds of contracts and conspiracies in view.

It is true that only contracts and conspiracies of the second kind have been before the courts since the passage of the act of 1890, but that is no argument against the view here taken. The law has been in force a comparatively short time, and it requires much time for cases involving every phase of any law to arise and be adjudicated. It may be observed, however, of these cases which have been adjudicated that the reasoning on which the judgments proceeded was as applicable to the one case as to the other, and that in none of the opinions is there the most remote suggestion that the law was not intended to cover both classes of cases. Can anyone doubt that if all the grain dealers in the United States should enter into a combination to commit the purchase of all corn bought in the United States to the hands of one firm or corporation, thereby compelling the farmers whose necessities compel them to sell, to sell at any price this firm or corporation might fix, that such combination would be declared to be in restraint of trade and commerce within the meaning of the act of 1890? If such a combination would be in restraint of trade and commerce, then this combination is in restraint of trade and commerce. The only difference in the two cases is one of degree in the number of individuals affected and the public injury inflicted.

These considerations do not appear to have occurred to Acting Attorney-General Whitney, Attorney-General Olney, or Attorney-General Griggs when they declined to intervene against this trust combination at the request of Mr. Tubman. Mr. Whitney contents himself with declaring that he did not think a "combination of present consumers of a given commodity effects a restraint or a monopoly of trade or commerce within the meaning of the act." Why such a combination does not have such an effect he does not undertake to show, unless his general statement, that a patentee is the owner of a monopoly and that the railroads are the sole consumers and the patentee the sole producer, can be taken as a reason in favor of his contention. The considerations stated by him appear to be entirely foreign to his conclusion. The latter is a complete non sequitur.

Attorney-General Olney does not discuss the questions involved at all, and it is evident that he gave them only perfunctory consideration, if he gave them any consideration. Attorney-General Griggs evidently did not see the features of this combination which enabled it to kill competition and to control at will the prices to be paid inventors for their patented inventions. He speaks of it as if its sole purpose was to keep in touch with new inventions affecting railway business and to examine and report concerning their validity, utility, and value. He does make one statement which bears on the subjects I have been discussing, but it is nothing but a bare statement, and, moreover, it is palpably incorrect. He says, "If his patent is valid there can be no competition." There can be competition between railways for the purchase of valuable railway patents. Suppose there was only one line of railroad from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast having the right to use the Westinghouse air brake, would not that line of railway have a great advantage over its competitors in the matter of passenger traffic, and if such a patent right were put up for sale for the exclusive use of two or more competing lines of railways, would there not be keen competition for its purchase? If the free right to vend patented inventions were not broken down and destroyed by this combination, there would be such inventions for which rival lines of railways would compete.

I have not thought it necessary to quote from the contract by which the Eastern Railroad Association was formed. That contract and the constitution and by-laws of the association made to carry it out shows its objects and purposes to be what I have stated. If I have committed an error it is in understatements rather than overstatements. Neither have I deemed it necessary to quote from, or refer to, the several cases construing and applying the act of 1890. They are too well known to the profession to require more than the mention I have made of them.

In conclusion, I think that the question of the character of this association may well be again submitted to the Attorney-General for examination, and for the action of the Department after such examination, with the confident hope and expectation that that examination will induce a different opinion and cause different action to be taken from that reached and taken when the matter was before under consideration in the Department of Justice.

Very respectfully,

GEO. TURNER.

EXHIBIT M.

Circuit court of the United States, district of Massachusetts. In equity. No. 2471. William K. Tubman v. Wason Manufacturing Company. Affidavit of John J. Harrower. Filed February 10, 1894.

I, John J. Harrower, of Washington, in the District of Columbia, make oath and say that I am secretary of the Eastern Railroad Association, whose office is at 614 F street NW., in said Washington; that Robert J. Fisher, counsel of said association, has directed me to appear on his behalf for the purpose of having forwarded to him for use in a cause in equity now pending in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, brought by the same complainant, Tubman, against the Pennsylvania Railroad Company (the said Eastern Railroad Association having carried on the defense in both of said causes on behalf of the defendants therein), certain exhibits, being models introduced as evidence by said defendant per said association, entitled in the printed record of this cause as follows: Defendants' exhibit, "Defendants' car;" defendants' exhibit, "Roberts's car;" which said models are now in the custody of the clerk of this court.

JNO. J. HARROWER.

Sworn to before me this 10th day of February, A. D. 1894.

ALEX. H. TROWBRIDGE,
Clerk United States Circuit Court, Massachusetts District.

I respectfully request that the said exhibits be forwarded by the clerk of this court to Robert J. Fisher, esq., counsel for the said Eastern Railroad Association, on the condition that they be carefully preserved in their present condition so that they can be returned to the custody of the clerk of this court whenever an order of court may be made requiring such return.

Very respectfully,

JNO. J. HARROWER.

ORDER.

[February 10, 1894.]

Colt, J. Ordered that said exhibits be delivered as prayed for, subject to the further condition that they be kept or used in the said court of Pennsylvania, subject to the order for return to this court.

Hon. GEORGE B. CORTELYOU,
Secretary to the President.

SIR: You will doubtless remember that on March 26 we placed in your hands an opinion by the Hon. William E. Chandler relative to the violation of the Federal antitrust law by the Eastern Railroad Association, and requested that the same be delivered to the President.

On December 21, 1901, we submitted to the President in person and filed certain printed documents and papers, among them being a copy of the association's unlawful agreement and a "statement" relating to the legal aspects of the same, and the President promised that he would give the matter careful consideration and call the attention of the honorable Attorney-General to it. Since the above date we have not received any communication from either the President or the Attorney-General relating thereunto.

We would be pleased to have the opportunity of discussing this matter with the President in person if you can make arrangements for us to do so.

Respectfully, yours,

H. B. MARTIN, Chairman,
F. E. STEBBINS, of Counsel.

EXHIBIT O.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 27, 1902.

Hon. THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States.

SIR: On December 21, 1901, the undersigned placed in your hands certain evidence in the form of papers and documents showing that the Eastern Railroad Association, a voluntary combination of nearly all railroad corporations in the fifteen Atlantic coast States, exists and pursues its iniquity in violation of the Federal antitrust law. You received the papers and stated that you would give the matter careful consideration and call the attention of the Attorney-General to it.

On January 23, 1902, we addressed a communication to the honorable Attorney-General, asking what action, if any, had been taken in the matter. Thus far the Attorney-General has failed to make any reply whatsoever.

On March 26, 1902, we placed in the hands of your secretary, Mr. G. B. Cortelyou, to deliver to you in person, a legal opinion by the Hon. William E. Chandler to the effect that the Eastern Railroad Association was an "illegal conspiracy," Mr. Chandler having carefully examined a substantial duplicate of the evidence filed with you on December 21, 1901.

On April 3, 1902, we addressed a letter to Mr. Cortelyou, relative to the disposition made of Mr. Chandler's opinion and expressed the desire for a personal interview with the President, and in reply received the following letter from your secretary:

WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, April 5, 1902.

MY DEAR SIR: I have your letter of the 3d instant, and in reply would say that your previous communication was, by the President's direction, brought to the attention of the Attorney-General on March 27. I would suggest that you communicate with Mr. Knox on the subject.

Very truly, yours,

GEO. B. CORTELYOU,
Secretary to the President.

Mr. H. B. MARTIN,
American Antitrust League,
1229 Pennsylvania avenue, Washington, D. C.

On May 21, 1902, we called at the Department of Justice and were told by the secretary to the Attorney-General that he was at the White House and that we could call up the Attorney-General's office by telephone at 2 o'clock p. m. and arrange for an interview. Upon leaving we gave the secretary a copy of a legal opinion, prepared with great care by the Hon. George Turner, showing that the Eastern Railroad Association was an illegal trust, and requested the secretary to hand the same to the honorable Attorney-General. At 2 o'clock Mr. Martin communicated with the secretary by telephone, as agreed, and was informed that "the Attorney-General will not be able to take up the case." Mr. Martin replied: "Will not take up the case at all?" and the secretary responded: "He says he will not be able to take it up at all."

Mr. Martin: "We called to see him at the suggestion of the President." The secretary: "He says he will not be able to take it up at all." On the morning of May 22 Mr. Martin received through the mail and in a Department of Justice envelope the copy of the opinion by Hon. George Turner, delivered to the secretary on the previous day, and which was the sole paper inclosed in the envelope. The postmark indicated that the opinion had been returned very soon after its delivery to the Attorney-General's secretary.

Believing in the law, "the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempted from her power," and that it should not be suspended and the courts closed, we again request consideration of our petition and that the Attorney-General be directed to institute suit in equity against the Eastern Railroad Association.

Among the papers filed with you on December 21, 1901, is a true copy of the constitution and by-laws of the association, which alone is ample ground for a suit. The decisions in United States v. The Trans-Missouri Freight Association, and United States v. The Joint Traffic Association, were rendered solely upon the agreements themselves. We will at any time furnish the Attorney-General with the original copy of the Eastern Railroad Association's agreement and proofs of its authenticity, and submit additional evidence of the association's unlawful and criminal acts and doings. The opinions of Hon. William E. Chandler and Hon. George Turner should not be disregarded, as they embody the views of most eminent publicists, gentlemen learned in the law, both of them "too wise to be deceived and too good to do wrong." The Hon. George F. Hoar has also verbally expressed the opinion that the Eastern Railroad Association violates the antitrust act, and it is believed he will reiterate his belief if solicited so to do. The late Hon. Jeremiah Wilson some two years ago reviewed all the evidence submitted by us on December 21, 1901, and repeatedly in person visited the Department of Justice for the purpose of soliciting the Attorney-General to bring suit.

We submit this communication with the confident belief that, if you once fully understand the nature and character of the Eastern Railroad Association, you will direct proper action to be taken by the Department of Justice.

In an article written by yourself and published in the Cosmopolitan, November, 1895, "Taking the New York police out of politics," are statements which apply to the enforcement of the antitrust law:

"Our enforcement of the Sunday excise law caused most disturbance. Up to the time we took office no official had ever made a serious and consistent effort to enforce the law. Almost all men of much experience insisted that the law could not be enforced. After carefully considering the matter, however, we came to the conclusion that it could be enforced, and that in any event we had no alternative save to try and enforce it if we wished to retain our self-respect or obey our oaths of office.

"We stood on the principle that the law should be honestly and fairly enforced while it remained on the statute books.

"It is a lamentable thing when the people and the public officials grow to think that laws should only be enforced as far as the officers of the law think that public opinion demands their enforcement. It is such a belief that inevitably leads to lynching, whitecapping, and all kindred forms of outrage."

In view of all the foregoing facts in this case we are compelled to appeal to you, Mr. President, to take the steps necessary in this emergency to compel your immediate subordinate, the Attorney-General, to proceed at once to enforce the Federal antitrust law against the Eastern Railroad Association. This case has been for months before the Attorney-General, and we believe that further delay can only be subversive of justice.

Respectfully submitted.

H. B. MARTIN,
Chairman.
F. E. STEBBINS,
of Counsel,
Joint Committee American Antitrust League and District Assembly 66, Knights of Labor.

Thus far the President has entirely ignored the last communication submitted by the antitrust league.

Attorneys-General Olney, Harmon, McKenna, Griggs, and Knox, for a period of some twelve years, refused to enforce the antitrust act.

All of these officials at the head of the Department of Justice apparently suspended the laws, and the suspending of laws has always been regarded as an offense.

But I do not know whether it be not a more dangerous mistake, without very good reason, to suspend the execution of the law still in force, for the sake of certain persons, than utterly to abrogate it. (Pufendorf, Law of Nations, VIII, 317.)

The pretended power of suspending laws and the execution of laws by legal authority without the consent of Parliament is illegal. (Declaration of Rights.)

When an officer neglects a duty incumbent upon him either by common law or by statute, he is indictable for his offense. (1 Russell on Crimes, 135.)

Whenever a duty is imposed upon a public officer, neglect to perform it is a public offense. (Wharton Criminal Law, vol. 1, sec. 10.)

Your own office also to be condemned in £50 of gold in case that upon the creation of any such prohibitive monopolies or corporate agreements, the above most wholesome penalties imposed by us shall in any instance, whether from venality or subterfuge, or in any other way, fail of being fully exacted. (Zeno's Law Against Monopolies. Corpus Juris Civilis, Cod. IV, Tit. LIX.)

If the laws, then, require a particular officer by name to perform a duty, not only is that officer bound to perform it, but no other officer can perform it without a violation of the law. (William Wirt, 1 Op. Atty. Gen., 625; 5 Op., 287.)

It is the constitutional duty of the President to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, but the Constitution consigns to Congress the power of designating the duties of particular subordinate officers, and the President is to take care that they execute their duties faithfully and honestly. (J. Y. Mason, 4 Op. Atty. Gen., 516.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read the following, to be inserted as a new section:

SEC. 12. That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, nine general appraisers of merchandise, each of whom shall receive a salary of $7,000 a year. Not more than five of such general appraisers shall be appointed from the same political party. They shall not be engaged in any other business, avocation, or employment, and may be removed from office at any time by the President only for inefficiency, mental or physical incapacity, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. They shall be employed at such ports and within such territorial limits as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time prescribe, and are hereby authorized to exercise the powers and duties devolved upon them by this act and to exercise, under the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, such other supervision over appraisements and classifications, for duty, of imported merchandise as may be needful to secure lawful and uniform apprainsements and classifications at the several ports. Three of the general appraisers shall be on duty as a board of general appraisers daily (except Sunday and legal holidays) at the port of New York, during the business hours prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, at which port a place for samples shall be provided, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time prescribe, which shall include rules as to the classes of articles to be deposited, the time of their retention, and as to their disposition, which place of samples shall be under the immediate control and direction of the board of general appraisers on duty at said port.

The amendment, to insert the above as section 12, was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following amendments, to be inserted in section 14:

On page 14, in line 16, after the word "it," strike out "said board" and insert "the general board of nine general appraisers."

In line 19, after the word "practice," strike out "as may be deemed necessary for the conduct of their proceedings not inconsistent with law" and insert "not inconsistent with law as may be deemed necessary for the conduct of its proceedings and of the proceedings of the said board of three general appraisers."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment to this section; in line 10, page 14, after the word "court," strike out "of appeals."

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 10, page 14, strike out "of appeals."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I will explain this, as other amendments of the same nature will be offered to the next section. The present law provides that an appeal from the Board of Appraisers shall go to the circuit court. The Board of Appraisers and the Treasury Department have, for some time, been anxious to have the appeal go directly to the circuit court of appeals, and they urged before the committee very strong reasons why appeals should go to the circuit court of appeals. I would not consent to this change now if I could help it, but my colleague from New York [Mr. PARSONS] has handed me a letter to him from the assistant district attorney showing that the circuit court of appeals there is already overburdened with business. It has decided in the last year 232 appeals, of which, I believe, only about 34 were from the decision of the circuit court in customs cases. Now, the appeals from the General Board of Appraisers to the circuit court number something over 300, if I recollect aright, during the year. If these 300 cases should go to the circuit court of appeals in a lump, added to the 232 cases which they decided last year, of course it would clog up the business of the court. So very reluctantly I concluded to offer this amendment, changing it back to the old system, providing for an appeal, however, from the circuit court under the general law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Recently we created another Federal court in New York City, and the President has appointed and the Senate has confirmed, I think, another Federal judge for that place.

Mr. PAYNE. That is only an additional judge of the circuit court.

Mr. PARSONS. And a new district judge, too; but if you send all these appeals to the circuit court of appeals you take up the time of three judges, whereas now you only take up the time of one judge. If you had given us three new judges, this change would not be necessary, but if you turn over all this work to the circuit court of appeals it will clog their calendar and they will soon get behind.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What change does this make? Who decides the matter now?

Mr. PARSONS. The importer first takes his appeal from the Board of General Appraisers to the circuit court. Then, under the present law, an appeal may be taken from the circuit court to the circuit court of appeals, and under the general law the importer can still take an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, but only a few of the cases go beyond the circuit court. Last year there were 344 appeals to the circuit court and, I think, only 34 appeals taken from the circuit court to the circuit court of appeals in these customs cases.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I believe Judge Somerville is one of your appraisers.

Mr. PARSONS. He is one of the Board of General Appraisers.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I know he is a very fine lawyer.

Mr. PARSONS. In that connection I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter from the district attorney from the southern district of New York about this matter, explaining the need for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the letter referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES ATTORNEY FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK,
New York, June 23, 1906.

Hon. HERBERT PARSONS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In consultation with my customs bureau, which has charge of those cases, I find that I have little difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the passage of the bill H. R. 19750, transferring appeals from the Board of Appraisers to the circuit court of appeals instead of the circuit court, would be a great calamity in this district. It would practically stall our circuit court of appeals.

You will remember that in the argument before the House committee on the subject of a new Federal judge, our statistics showed that our circuit court of appeals last year heard 232 appeals as against 156, which was the highest number heard in any other circuit. The number of appeals from the General Appraisers which were heard here last year in the circuit court was 349, while only 45 appeals were taken from the circuit court and heard in the circuit court of appeals. In other words, the method of hearing appeals in the circuit court sifts out about six-sevenths of the appeals from the General Appraisers, leaving only about one-seventh to go up to the circuit court of appeals. If all these appeals under the new legislation necessarily went to the circuit court of appeals, there would be an increase of seven times the number of customs cases now heard there and the number of customs cases would mean an addition to the calendar of the circuit court of appeals of nearly 150 per cent.

You will remember also that at the hearing our statistics showed that our circuit court of appeals was very much overworked, not only hearing more appeals, but hearing them under a greater pressure than any other circuit. To more than double the number of cases before them would work results which you yourself can calculate.

Another way of looking at it is that at present these appeals from the General Appraisers are heard and decided by one judge. The new method would make it necessary to have them heard by three judges, thus using two additional men to do the work that is now done by one. The results of the present system are so satisfactory that only one-seventh of the appeals are taken beyond the circuit court. There would, therefore, seem to be no demand on the part of the public for a change.

I am told that the customs bar is unanimous against the proposed change; that the only demand for the change came from the Board of General Appraisers, who are constantly striving to dignify their positions, and wish to have their decisions reviewed only by the highest court.

Finally, I have figures showing that since January 1, 1900, there have been 1,542 appeals from the Board of General Appraisers to the United States circuit court and only 181 appeals during those six years from the circuit court to the circuit court of appeals.

Faithfully, yours,

HENRY L. STIMSON,
United States Attorney.

The amendment offered by Mr. PAYNE was then agreed to.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from New York in charge of the bill a question. On page 12, line 3, he will see that two days only are allowed for an importer to give notice of dissatisfaction in case of an appraisement, whereas under the existing law ten days is allowed if he is dissatisfied with the classification. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman why it is that the discrimination is made, and if, in his opinion, two days are long enough to allow for an appeal in the case of dissatisfaction with an appraisement?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, this provision has been in the law since 1890, and I never heard any complaint about it except from the gentleman from Massachusetts, who called my attention to a case where a man had lost his rights because he didn't know the provision of law. Having been in the law so long, I did not think it was best to change. There seems to be no imperative reason for making the change, and where men get used to a certain time for giving notice—get used to a custom—it is better to leave it as it is. I never heard any complaint until the gentleman from Massachusetts stated his case.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of offering an amendment, as I have ascertained that it would not be accepted, and because we have got beyond the paragraph, but I should like to state to this committee exactly the circumstances which have arisen in order to have them a matter of record for future use.

A manufacturer of morocco goods in my district imported a lot of sheepskins with the wool on them. The duty on wool is a specific duty of so much a pound, according to grade. He imported the sheepskins, and they were appraised in the port of Boston as having 70 per cent of them wool. The duty was assessed accordingly. The importer's factory is in the town of Peabody. It was absolutely impossible for him within two days to have the sheepskins removed to Peabody and there have the wool pulled and the wool and waste weighed. He did it as quickly as he could, brought the wool and waste before the public weigher, and it was demonstrated that only 54 per cent of the importation was wool and waste and therefore subject to duty. Yet he was assessed 70 per cent, and he had no possible remedy, because the two days had expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 20410) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SCOTT, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. CULBERSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4774) relating to the movements and anchorage of vessels in Hampton Roads, the harbors of Norfolk and Newport News, and adjacent waters, in the State of Virginia, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. NELSON, Mr. GALLINGER, and Mr. MARTIN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 10501. An act to incorporate the National Educational Association of the United States; and

H. R. 20290. An act to amend the river and harbor act of March 3, 1905.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution without amendment:

House concurrent resolution 30.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound 11,000 copies of the addresses delivered at the exercises commemorative of John Paul Jones at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., April 24, 1906, together with other papers and illustrations germane thereto, to be compiled and published under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, 7,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, 3,000 for the use of the Senate, and 1,000 for distribution by the Secretary of the Navy.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendments House concurrent resolutions of the following titles:

House concurrent resolution 15.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound, for the use of the Treasury Department, 500 additional copies of the Annual Report of the Treasurer of the United States for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1905.

House concurrent resolution —.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be requested to return to the House H. R. 18901, granting a pension to John E. English.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 20403. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1476) granting certain lands to the town of Tincup, Colo., for cemetery purposes.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the general deficiency bill, and I move that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to call up the general deficiency bill with Senate amendments, nonconcur in the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Chair appointed as conferees Mr. LITTAUER, Mr. TAWNEY, and Mr. BRUNDIDGE.

COLLECTION OF REVENUES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. PAYNE. In reply to the gentleman's last statement about the pulling of the wool, the gentleman's constituent had an easy way out of it. The law provides that anyone can file a protest, and it doesn't cost anything for filing. He does not lose anything by it, and of course if the wool turns out to be only 50 per cent instead of 70 per cent of the whole importation, he gains by filing a protest. He does not have to swear to it or assert any facts in it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I take issue with the gentleman from New York in regard to that being an easy way out of it. I am informed that the custom-house brokers do make a charge for doing just such things and for attending to the filing of protests.

Mr. PAYNE. I did not say that a man would not have to pay his lawyer or attorney; but he could do it himself.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. It is not a fair thing to require the importer always to file a protest every time he imports a lot of sheepskins, because it is an unnecessary annoyance and an unnecessary expense. The law ought, in some way or other, be so arranged that a man has a reasonable opportunity to file an appeal. He ought to have time to find out the waste in time to protest against an appraisement as high as 70 per cent. As it is, it was not humanly possible for my constituent to get the consignment to his factory and have the wool pulled and weighed within two days. I admit he could have filed his protest, but that means that every man who imports such skins shall file a protest the moment they arrive, and that is absurd.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That if the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of any imported merchandise, or the collector, or the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be dissatisfied with the decision of the board of general appraisers, as provided for in section 14 of this act, as to the construction of the law and the facts respecting the classification of such merchandise and the rate of duty imposed thereon under such classification, they, or either of them, may within thirty days next after such decision, and not afterwards, apply to the circuit court of appeals of the United States within the circuit in which the matter arises for a review of the questions of law and fact involved in such decision. Such application shall be made by filing in the office of the clerk of said circuit court of appeals a concise statement of the errors of law and fact complained of, and a copy of such statement shall be served on the collector, or on the importer, owner, consignee, or agent, as the case may be. Thereupon the court shall order the board of appraisers to return to said circuit court of appeals the record and the evidence taken by them, together with the certified statement of the facts involved in the case, and their decisions thereon; and all the evidence taken by and before said appraisers shall be competent evidence before said circuit court of appeals. The said circuit court of appeals is further vested with the power, on the hearing of any appeal taken from the decision of a board of three general appraisers, to order said board to take additional testimony as to any particular fact or issue in dispute, and return the same to said court as soon as convenient, whenever the said court shall be of opinion that the ends of justice will be best subserved by this course of procedure. In other respects the parties litigant shall be required to introduce all of their evidence before the said board of general appraisers prior to its decision of the case. Such further evidence, with the aforesaid returns, shall constitute the record upon which said circuit court of appeals shall give priority to and proceed to hear and determine the questions of law and fact involved in such decision, respecting the classification of such merchandise and the rate of duty imposed thereon under such classification, and the decision of such court shall be final, and the proper collector, or person acting as such, shall liquidate the entry accordingly, unless said decision is reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States in any of the ways provided by the act approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to establish circuit courts of appeals, and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes." Said Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction and power to review such decision, and shall give priority to such cases, and may affirm, modify, or reverse such decision of such circuit court of appeals, and remand the case with such orders as may seem to it proper in the premises, which shall be executed accordingly. All final judgments, when in favor of the importer, shall be satisfied and paid by the Secretary of the Treasury from the permanent indefinite appropriation provided for in section 23 of this act. For the purposes of this section the circuit courts of appeals of the United States shall be deemed always open, and said circuit courts of appeals, respectively, may establish, and from time to time alter, rules and regulations not inconsistent herewith for the procedure in such cases as they shall deem proper.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I have several amendments I wish to offer to that section, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "of appeals."
Page 15, line 8, strike out the word "circuit" and insert "district."
Page 15, line 12, strike out the words "of appeals."
Page 15, line 21, strike out twice the words "of appeals."
Page 16, line 7, strike out the words "of appeals."
Page 17, line 4, strike out the words "of appeals."
Lines 5 and 6, page 17, strike out the words "of appeals."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 13, page 16, after the word "accordingly," insert: "Unless either party shall, within thirty days after the rendition of such decision, appeal to the circuit court of appeals. Said circuit court of appeals shall give priority to and proceed to hear and determine the questions involved in said decision, and the decision of said circuit court of appeals shall be final, and the proper collector or other person acting as such shall liquidate the entry accordingly."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, something was said about further debate at this time. I am perfectly willing that it should go on now. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] may be recognized for twenty-five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] may be recognized for twenty-five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, during this session of Congress we have been treated to some remarkable speeches upon the tariff question. The Republican side of this House has indulged in the delusion that all of the good things that have come to us came through the instrumentality of the Republican party and are the beneficent fruits of the Dingley tariff law. If Providence smiles upon us kindly and the seasons are good and the land yields abundantly, these clarion-voiced tariff orators of the Republican side cry aloud to the people to fall down and give thanks to the Dingley tariff law. Mr. Chairman, if you should wander out with them into the forest, where the broad branches unite in cathedral arches and the winds make music down the long leafy aisles, where every bough is quivering with the song and flight of birds, and the rose-tinted atmosphere is perfumed with the fragrance of wild flowers, and ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS], and the tall sycamore from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] whom should we praise for all these things, out of the fullness of their hearts they would say, "to the Dingley tariff law." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I would do violence to an amusing emotion if I should overlook the funny remarks of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN]. For the clams that old ocean used to pour at his feet when his stomach rose and fell in perfect harmony with the ebb and flow of the tide he did, sir, appear to be thankful. He, too, made a pass at the tariff question. He chased it across the continent and back again, and finally overtook it where the clam-laden shore of his own State made farther retreat impossible. When finally he touched the remotest hem of its garment the pleased expression on his face and the accents of his soft voice reminded me of a story that I once heard of a fellow who played "tag" so much when a boy that he lost his mind temporarily. He was confined for a while at an asylum for the insane. Late one afternoon, when wandering in the grove near the asylum, he discovered a man walking around amusing himself by looking at the buildings and surroundings. The young man whose mind was temporarily deranged gave one or two shrieks and made a bold dash toward the strange man. The man, thinking that he was in great danger of being brutally assaulted, turned quickly facing his assailant; but, nothing daunting, his fierce antagonist rushed upon him, touched him on the shoulder, crossed his fingers, and with a curious smile on his face said softly: "I got your tag." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Washington had almost frightened the Democrats into believing that he was really about to assail our position on the tariff question, just when we thought he would touch the subject before he closed, he paused—and great was the pause—smiled curiously, crossed his fingers, and softly said: "I got your tag." [Applause on the Democratic side.] Amidst tremendous applause on the Republican side the tall sycamore from the State of Washington sank into his seat.

Now, Mr. Chairman, having fully and completely answered the tariff speech of the gentleman from Washington [laughter], I move on to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL]. In his labored effort to answer the tariff speech of Mr. RAINEY he reminded me of what once occurred in the supreme court of Alabama. Col. John A. Elmore, a distinguished lawyer, was undertaking to reply to a powerful and unanswerable argument made by Hon. William L. Yancey. He made an eloquent and attractive speech, but he could not get around the facts in the case and the able argument of Mr. Yancey. He amused the court and his hearers by his wit and humor and his artistic dodging proclivities. When summing up the case, Colonel Elmore paused, looked at the judges, and smiled. The chief justice of the court, who was very much amused, saw the predicament that Colonel Elmore was in, said to him, "Well, what now, Colonel?" "If your honor please," said Colonel Elmore, "candor compels me to admit that in my effort to reply to the position taken by my distinguished opponent, Colonel Yancey, I have literally argued myself out of court." [Applause.]

Mr. BOUTELL, at the conclusion of his speech, should have been recognized for the purpose of making a like confession. He failed utterly to answer Mr. RAINEY's speech. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS], while trying to defend the present tariff system, referred to the prosperity of Birmingham, Ala. There the Almighty has stored away untold wealth in the treasury of the hills, and the industry and the enterprise of a brave people have united in producing a marvelous prosperity; and this disciple of Dingleyism gives the credit not to the lavish hand of nature or the pluck and industry of the people, but with eloquent words lays it all at the door of the tariff system. And the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS], who boasts that he is a "stand-patter," rather enjoyed reminding us that the great father of the present obnoxious tariff system [Mr. Dingley] sleeps in an unmarked grave. Ah, Mr. Chairman, this neglect of him by the heartless "protected few" that he served so well is but evidence of the fact that the tariff barons have no regard for the living save for the opportunity that such regard offers for robbery and plunder; and they care so little for the dead that they will not so much as toss a penny toward a fund to erect a monument to his memory whose tariff system did and does their cursed coffers fill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Freeze, freeze, oh, bitter sky
That dost not bite so nigh
As benefits forgot;
Though thou the waters warp,
The sting is not so sharp
As friends remembered not.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Knowing that they have failed utterly to carry out their pledges to the people, and trembling with fear before the approaching election, the Republicans in this House saw the old tariff ship tossed upon the bosom of a restless sea. Then they cried loud and long for one skilled in the art of commanding a vessel on a stormy sea. For a moment silence reigned, and, lo! Uncle PETE HEPBURN, the old tariff sea captain of Iowa, appeared. But, Mr. Chairman, in spite of his Republican skill and tariff genius, the old vessel—

Heaved and sot, and sot and heaved,
And high her rudder flung,
And every time she heaved and sot
A mighty leak she sprung.

[Laughter and applause.]

The Republican party claims credit for the existence of every good thing, even regarding those things over which they have absolutely no control. Now that money of final redemption is plentiful, they say that it is the result of Republican policies and legislation. The fact is that the Democratic party in 1896 contended for more money of final redemption. The Republican party refused to open the mints and God Almighty opened the mines. And the large increase in the volume of money of final redemption establishes the correctness of the Democratic contention at that time. Mr. Chairman, if you should ask one of the protective tariff advocates to whom we should be grateful for sunshine and shower, he would out of the fullness of his heart exclaim the Dingley tariff system.

When the people demanded tariff revision, you promised to revise. When they demanded that trusts be destroyed, you promised to destroy them. You have not kept these pledges. Under the reign of the Republican party trusts have multiplied, and they flourish to-day as never before in the history of the country. Private fortunes are springing up in the wake of the robber tariff, and graft, the latest offspring of Republican conditions, is rampant in the Republic. The consumer here sees American products sold to the foreigner at a price lower than he enjoys in his home land. Tribute money is demanded of the American by the American Government and under Republican tariff system, while favoritism is enjoyed by the foreigner to the detriment of our own people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, when the land yields abundantly, responds liberally to the pulse beats of the enterprising plowman and the demands of the people are increasing and the people themselves becoming more and more industrious and enterprising, and because in spite of special privileges and Republican favoritism we enjoy in a large measure material prosperity, the Republican party is ready to proclaim from every house top that the credit for all this is due the Republican party. The gall of the Republican party is marvelous. The comforts and conveniences of life that the American people in a measure enjoy to-day are not the products of the Republican party; but through the skill, the industry and enterprise of our people they have been achieved over Republican difficulties and in spite of the Republican party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You boast before election times about what you will do when you get in office.

Bees on flowers lighting cease their hum,
And Republicans in office soon grow dumb.

To-day the Democratic party has asked you to lay the hand of destruction upon the trusts that corrupt the electorate of the country and rob the people. We have asked you not to allow the ballot to become a matter of commodity for sale and traffic to the highest bidder. You refuse to do that. You do not want to cut off this hand of contribution that comes in and aids you so materially in election time. Like Jove of old—

You have turned your thunder into showers of gold, whose silent courtship wins securer joys.
Taints by degrees and ruins without noise.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I have not the time to discuss this subject as I would like to discuss it. There are many other things to which I would like to call attention. Day by day, under your control, State rights are being crucified. The right of trial by jury in Federal courts is nearly a thing of the past.

The Republican party is a time server. When one in your own ranks, like the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] stands up and advocates what he believes is right, and fights to protect the life of this nation from the dangers that threaten it, he has a lecture delivered to him by some of your party leaders to whip him into line. The greed of monopoly has marked her for its own. You have broken your pledges to the people. You have failed utterly to give them relief from the burdens of class legislation; and we propose to put upon the breast of your party the "scarlet letter" of deceit and unfaithfulness to the American people. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. WALDO. Mr. Chairman, all during this session I have been in hopes that the ship-subsidy bill might come before us for passage. It is, to my mind, one of the most important, if not the most important, measure that is now pending before Congress. Our shipping has decreased until we have barely any upon the sea. Only about 10 per cent of our great foreign commerce is carried in American ships. There has been a clamor all over the country ever since the civil war for some measure that would restore the American merchant marine. We have spent enormous sums to build up a navy. We have this year given great appropriations to keep our Navy in repair and to construct new vessels; but the most serious objection has been made, upon the other side of the House, at least, to the expenditure of any money whatever for the rehabilitation of the American merchant marine.

We of New York have a special commission here to do whatever we can to bring about the passage of the ship subsidy bill. A concurrent resolution in favor of the merchant marine bill was passed by the New York State legislature in February, 1906. This resolution is as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN SENATE,
Albany, February 8, 1906.

Introduced by Mr. Henry W. Hill.

A concurrent resolution of the legislature of the State of New York, addressed to the United States Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States from the State of New York, in relation to American shipping in the foreign trade by sea.

Whereas our merchant marine engaged in the foreign trade, which in 1810 carried 90 per cent of our foreign commerce and to-day carries but 10 per cent thereof, is now only one-third as large as it was in the zenith of its development in 1860; and

Whereas an American merchant marine, with trained and experienced shipmasters, officers, and seamen, sailing under the flag of the United States, is essential to our national defense as an auxiliary to the Navy in time of need; and

Whereas upon the recommendation of President Roosevelt a commission consisting of five Senators and five Representatives in Congress was appointed to investigate this subject, and public hearings were held in most of the leading Atlantic, Gulf, Lake, and Pacific ports of the United States, resulting in a report, accompanied by a bill to carry into effect the recommendation of the Commission, which measure is now pending in the Congress of the United States and is designed to upbuild and rehabilitate our shipping in the foreign trade: Therefore, be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the legislature of the State of New York commends the work, the report, and the bill of the Congressional Merchant Marine Commission as worthy of the support of the Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States from the State of New York. Be it further Resolved (if the assembly concur), That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of New York.

By order of the senate.

LAFAYETTE B. GLEASON, Clerk.

IN ASSEMBLY, February 12, 1906.

Concurred in without amendment.

By order of the assembly.

A. E. BAXTER, Clerk.

It is not a new thing in this country that aid should be given to American shipping. One of the first things that was done when the American Congress met, after the adoption of the Constitution, was to pass a bill to aid not only American manufactures, but also American shipping. This bill was introduced by James Madison, and gave to American shipping 10 per cent discriminating duties on all imports over those brought in in foreign ships. This bill was supported by the President, General Washington, by Hamilton, by Jefferson, and it was largely through Jefferson's efforts that the bill was finally passed and the opposition of the South overcome. The immediate result of this bill was an enormous increase in American shipping. The bill was the result of a memorial that came from the citizens of Baltimore to the first session of the Congress of 1789. This petition reads:

Your petitioners, on whichever side they may turn their eyes, see reason to believe that the United States may soon become as powerful in shipping as any nation in the world. * * * Permit us to add that for want of national protection and encouragement that great source of strength and riches has fallen into decay and involved thousands in the utmost distress.

Jefferson in 1791, when he was Secretary of State, issued a paper in favor of the protection of our merchant marine and fisheries that did more than anything else to secure the continued support of the South for that measure. As a result of the adoption of these discriminating duties our shipping increased almost immediately. In 1789 we had only 123,893 tons of American shipping. In 1800 it had increased to 667,107 tons. In 1791 the total amount of our foreign commerce was $48,212,041. Of that only about 30 per cent was carried in American ships. In 1800, although our foreign commerce had increased to $162,224,548, the amount then carried by American ships was 89 per cent. To-day, although its proportions have become enormous, the amount of our foreign commerce carried by American ships is only about 10 per cent.

President McKinley repeatedly sent in messages to Congress in favor of this measure. In the Republican platform of 1904 we declared:

While every other industry has prospered under the fostering aid of Republican legislation, American shipping engaged in foreign trade, in competition with the low cost of construction, low wages, and heavy subsidies of foreign governments, has not for many years received from the Government of the United States adequate encouragement of any kind. We therefore favor legislation which will encourage and build up the American merchant marine, and we cordially approve the legislation of the last Congress which created the Merchant Marine Commission to investigate and report upon this subject.

At the convening of this Congress President Roosevelt sent a message which included this paragraph, directly following the platform of 1904, and following other declarations of President Roosevelt before that time:

To the spread of our trade in peace and the defense of our flag in war a great and prosperous merchant marine is indispensable. We should have ships of our own and seamen of our own to convey our goods to neutral markets, and in case of need to reenforce our battle line. It can not but be a source of regret and uneasiness to us that the lines of communication with our sister republics of South America should be chiefly under foreign control. It is not a good thing that American merchants and manufacturers should have to send their goods and letters to South America via Europe if they wish security and dispatch. Even on the Pacific, where our ships have held their own better than on the Atlantic, our merchant flag is now threatened through the liberal aid bestowed by other governments on their own steam lines. I ask your earnest consideration of the report with which the Merchant Marine Commission has followed its long and careful inquiry.

We have, then, here the policy of this country in its earliest years and the recommendation of Presidents Harrison, McKinley, and Roosevelt to grant aid to American shipping. In the time of President Polk subventions were granted to our ships of sufficient amount to aid in the growth of the merchant marine. To-day we are about the only one of the seafaring nations that has not given efficient aid to its merchant marine. In 1905 foreign nations granted subventions amounting to over $27,000,000 in aid of their steamship lines. Our aid has been so trifling that the only American lines that we now have left are about to abandon the seas unless they receive additional aid at once.

Next year Great Britain will grant subventions in aid of her merchant marine amounting to between $6,000,000 and $7,000,000; France, over $8,000,000; Italy, $3,000,000; Japan, $4,000,000, and other nations in less amounts. The present merchant-marine bill, if it is passed, will in the next ten years cause an average yearly expense to this Government of about $4,600,000.

While Congress has done nothing with regard to any aid, even this small aid to American shipping, it gives a hundred million dollars in aid of its Navy and enormous aid for the improving of the harbors of the country. It will expend $135,000,000 in the construction of a great waterway across the Isthmus of Panama. We have scarcely any deep-sea going American ships to use the harbors for which we are expending so much money. We have no American ships to go through the Panama Canal, and the moneys that we are now expending for American harbors are almost entirely in the interest of and aid to foreign ships. There are few of our larger harbors that are not ample in their waterways for any American ships that use them, and the increase in the depth of these harbors is intended almost entirely for foreign shipping. The great city of New York has spent millions of dollars in the improvement of its dock system, little of it to be used by American shipping, but nearly all for the benefit of foreign shipowners. The American people are spending between $150,000,000 and $200,000,000 a year in freights to foreign countries, mostly to Great Britain, Germany, and France.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. WALDO. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell us why so much capital has gone out of American ships?

Mr. WALDO. There are two reasons for that. At one time it was because there was such an enormous transportation development on land in this country that it required the investment of practically all the money offered, and at that time there was much greater profit in that investment than there was in ships. The other reason is because the repeal of discriminatory duties permitted foreign ships to carry goods abroad and bring them from abroad on exactly the same terms as we permitted them carried in American ships, instead of giving, as in the time of Washington and Jefferson, a 10 per cent discriminatory duty in favor of all imports in American ships.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the difference between existing laws and those under the act of 1846, when we hauled 75 per cent or 80 per cent of our tonnage in American ships?

Mr. WALDO. I understand the ship subvention at that time was ample to meet the special subventions of other parts of the world. To-day they are not, and the subventions of foreign countries are in many instances very large. The discriminatory duties have all been repealed, and to-day we have practically no protection for and no American ships engaged in foreign commerce.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think that this may retard it, that the foreign ship does not want to come with an empty hull to haul off freight, and the reason why it comes practically empty is because the importer can not pay the high tariff to compete with the home manufacturer?

Mr. WALDO. I think not; I think that would be met at once. If we allowed a discriminatory duty of 10 per cent, as was done in the original act, gave a discount of 10 per cent to all importers whose goods were brought here in ships built in America, I have no question but that the merchant marine would be doubled within two or three years if that was done.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALDO. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. How does the gentleman figure that discriminating duties would build up the merchant marine, when 47 per cent of our imports are now on the free list?

Mr. WALDO. Because they would secure from those that are not on the free list enough under the 10 per cent reduction to make it profitable to build ships here and run them. I think also we ought to have subventions that would meet the subventions granted by the great seafaring countries abroad.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman, my colleague, yield?

Mr. WALDO. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does the gentleman think that the same conditions exist to-day that prevailed in times gone by, spoken of by him, when money sought manufacturing and mercantile pursuits because it pays better than money invested in shipping?

Mr. WALDO. No; I think there is surplus capital to-day that could be had at reasonable rates for investment in shipping, providing that American ships brought in a reasonable return.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I would like to ask if that question is not answered by this fact: If our shippers had the same advantages as foreign shippers American capital could be found to engage in it from the fact that millions of American capital is invested in ships under a foreign flag. Does not that demonstrate that if they had an equal chance they would invest in American ships?

Mr. WALDO. I do not know what the gentleman means by "an equal chance."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I mean to equalize the conditions by subsidies sufficient to equalize the undertaking. To take a concrete illustration, take the case that happened at Puget Sound. We have an American steamship line consisting of five vessels running to the Orient. Running directly from the same wharf is a Japanese line of three vessels, and they are subsidized at $35,000 a year. There are three English vessels that are subsidized for $300,000 a year. These five large ships of the Boston Steamship Company do not get anything. Does not the gentleman think that American capital would invest in it if they could have the subsidy?

Mr. WALDO. Undoubtedly; there is no question about that. My further contention is that we ought to give in favor of American ships a discriminatory duty, which would be a great incentive that would work automatically, and it would have the same effect that it did in 1789 and would more than double our merchant marine in a few years. In 1789 our merchant marine doubled in one year on account of such a discriminatory duty, and I see no reason why this result would not follow the adoption of discriminating duties to-day. I believe it would, and it would work injury to no one and would be for the benefit and protection of American shipping, which is the only American industry that to-day has no effective protection.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALDO. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. I understand the gentleman's argument to be that because the shipping business is not profitable, a subvention, as he calls it, or a subsidy, in other words, ought to be given by the Government out of the Public Treasury to that industry.

Mr. WALDO. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. JAMES. Now, the tobacco-raising business in my district is not profitable by reason of the combination of tobacco buyers into a trust and the fact that the Government places a tax on tobacco that denies the raiser of tobacco the right to sell the tobacco to the general consumer. Would the gentleman be in favor of giving to the tobacco growers a subvention or subsidy to make the tobacco-raising business profitable in Kentucky?

Mr. WALDO. I would not. I would be in favor of passing such laws as would prevent any trust from bringing about that result which the gentleman says obtains in his district.

Mr. JAMES. Then the gentleman would be willing to give the subsidy to the rich and those who have plenty of money to buy ships, but a man who has a little farm and can raise nothing but tobacco he would deny it to?

Mr. WALDO. Not at all. It is a different matter altogether, and there are other inducements that call for it. We may say in the first instance, I think, that tobacco raising is of no particular benefit to the people of this country. It may be a pleasure to some gentlemen, but it is no particular benefit to the country at large. It is a luxury, and it ought to pay; but, aside from that, the main objection, as I understand, to the profitable result from the tobacco industry in this country is the tobacco trust that controls the prices. We should control the trust, just as we do in our other local industries.

Mr. JAMES. A bill was introduced in this Congress for that purpose, but you can not even get the chairman of the Finance Committee, who is the leader of the gentleman's party, to call a meeting of the committee to consider it.

Mr. WALDO. Unfortunately, I would say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], that I do not control the leader of this party or the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and that if I did this ship-subsidy bill would have been on this floor and passed before this time.

Mr. JAMES. Well, there was no trouble about the ship subsidy in the Senate, I imagine.

Mr. WALDO. It does not seem to be able to pass here.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to ask my colleague for his position on this question—being interested with my friend from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] as members of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee—I would like to know just what his position is? He speaks of being favorable to a subvention, to a subsidy, and to discriminatory duties.

Mr. WALDO. I am.

Mr. GOULDEN. That seems to be rather a complex system, and I would be delighted if the gentleman will tell us just exactly how he would work out that scheme, and also about how much of a subvention would be necessary in order to enable the merchant marine of this country to be placed upon what I think he would call a sound and safe footing.

Mr. WALDO. It is my opinion, as far as I have been able to ascertain, that the subventions proposed by the bill now pending here in this present Congress would give that result. There is no difficulty whatever about discriminatory duties. That can be fixed in one of two ways. It has been done in both ways in this country in the past—either by a reduction, a discount of 10 per cent from the general duty upon all goods that are imported in American ships run by American owners, or by adding 10 per cent to the general schedule on all goods that are brought in in foreign ships.

Mr. GOULDEN. May I be permitted to say to the gentleman that those who oppose the Senate bill now before the House committee were rather favorably disposed toward discriminatory duties, but the distinguished chairman of that committee came out in a report, which was published and put in the RECORD of this House, showing that discriminatory duties were simply impossible and impracticable?

Mr. WALDO. They are not impracticable. Of course it would require this thing to be done: There are certain treaties that would have to be abrogated or modified sufficiently to allow a discrimination in favor of our own ships, but there is no reason why that can not be done.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Treaties with certain favored nations?

Mr. WALDO. Yes. There is no reason why that can not be done whenever we are ready to do it.

Mr. GOULDEN. I am in favor of discriminatory duties, under proper restrictions, to build up the merchant marine of the country.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman speaks of the discriminatory duty to restore our ships to the sea. Did we have a discriminatory duty such as the gentleman speaks of between 1846 and 1860, when we hauled from 75 to 80 per cent of our commerce in American ships?

Mr. WALDO. At that time we were giving national aid to our merchant marine, and the contest was not so severe between our own and foreign shipping as now. It may be that if we had not had our deep-sea shipping almost entirely driven from the seas during the civil war we should not be in as bad condition as we are to-day, but our shipping was entirely swept from the seas at that time, and nothing has been done to restore it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, if the gentleman will indulge me—and I do not want to interrupt him further, for he is making a very interesting speech—from 1846 to 1857 we had an ad valorem tariff of about 30 per cent, and under the tariff of 1857, when all parties, Republicans, Democrats, Whigs, Know-Nothings, got together in Congress and reduced that tariff and made it the lowest tariff we have had since 1812, that existed down to 1861, we hauled from 75 to 80 per cent of our tonnage in our ships. We controlled the seas. Now, it seems to me that we ought to get the tariff reduced a little bit, and then we would not need to go into the Treasury and pay some man to carry on his business better than he is already carrying it on, and then the ships would not come here with their hulls empty and go back with their hulls filled with our commerce.

Mr. WALDO. I fail to see——

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman from New York will allow me, there was never a time when the American merchant marine was nearly 50 per cent of the merchant marine of the world, nor was it ever 25 per cent. Now, a word in regard to discriminating duties. They are impossible under forty-odd commercial treaties with the great nations of the world, because we have stipulated distinctly against any discrimination in favor of the merchant marine of our country or in favor of the merchant marine of any other country. Now, again, under our free list, which carries more than 48 per cent of the imports into this country, there can not be any discriminating duties, because, to illustrate: Two merchant vessels are lying at Brazil loading with coffee, one of American registry and another of British registry. How can you have a discriminating duty, how can you pay the American more than you do the British, when there is no tariff on the commodity of coffee? And so it is all along the line. It is an ancient and long-ago obsolete proposition.

Mr. WALDO. I will say, in reply to what the gentleman from Ohio has stated, I am perfectly well aware of these treaties of which he speaks, but there is no reason why they should continue forever to the detriment of our shipping. I am opposed to it. So far as the free list is concerned, it always has been that way. There has never been any time when we could make discriminating duties on those articles coming in free. Discrimination can only apply to articles taxed, and never did apply to anything else. I did not say the American merchant marine was 50 per cent, or even 25 per cent, of the merchant marine of the world. What I did say was that 23.6 per cent of our commerce, both exports and imports, was carried in American ships in 1789. Under the discriminating duties act 89 per cent of all our foreign commerce was in 1800 carried in our own ships. The remarkable growth of the American merchant marine as well as commerce during the first twelve years of the protective law of 1789 is shown by the following table:

American tonnage and foreign trade, 1789–1800.

Year.	Shipping tonnage.	Total foreign commerce.	Proportion carried in American ships.
			Imports.	Exports.	Combined imports and exports.
			Per ct.	Per ct.	Per cent.
1789	123,893		17.5	30.0	23.6
1790	346,254		41.0	40.0	40.5
1791	363,110	$48,212,041	58.0	52.0	55.9
1792	411,438	52,253,098	67.0	61.0	64.0
1793	367,734	57,209,572	82.0	77.0	79.5
1794	438,863	67,643,725	91.0	86.0	88.5
1795	529,471	117,746,140	92.0	88.0	90.0
1796	576,733	140,010,789	94.0	90.0	92.0
1797	597,777	126,674,116	92.0	88.0	90.0
1798	603,376	129,879,111	91.0	87.0	89.0
1799	657,142	157,734,670	90.0	87.0	88.5
1800	667,107	162,224,548	91.0	87.0	89.0

This table shows a remarkable and constant growth in the tonnage of our merchant ships, with no falling off in any year except 1793. This was occasioned largely, if not wholly, by the depredations of Barbary pirates.

Neither is a law for discriminating duties on goods brought in American ships "an ancient or obsolete proposition," as the gentleman from Ohio states.

A measure for this purpose was advocated most strenuously in the Senate in 1897. In the report of the Senate Committee on Commerce (Report No. 10, 59th Cong., 1st sess.) favoring the passage of the ship-subsidy bill, at page 96 in the appendix, remarks on "discriminating duties," will be found the following statement:

It is probable that when the Commission was appointed a majority of those Senators and Representatives composing it who had positive views favored another trial of the discriminating-duty policy and believed that that course would be recommended to Congress. Moreover, from the very beginning of the inquiry, powerful arguments for the discriminating-duty plan were advanced, especially by the Maritime Association of the Port of New York, the largest shipping-trade organization in America. This "policy of the fathers of the Republic," as it was well described, was ably advocated not only by many practical shipowners and shipbuilders, but by many manufacturers and merchants—usually, however, in connection with the policy of mail subventions to regular lines, which may be said to have met with almost unanimous support in every section of the country.

The Merchant Marine Commission and the present committees of the House and Senate failed to recommend discriminating duties, mainly because of the difficulty met in some thirty reciprocity treaties with foreign nations and the danger of retaliations of foreign governments.

It is for these reasons and for the reason that our merchant marine must have efficient and prompt aid and protection or disappear from the seas that I favor the measure now before the House for that purpose, although it does not include discriminating duties.

Senate bill 529, framed by the President's Merchant Marine Commission and passed February 14 by the Senate, provides for:

1. A volunteer naval reserve of 10,000 officers and men of the merchant marine and fisheries, trained in gunnery, etc., subject to the call of the President in war, and receiving retainer bounties as 33,500 British naval-reserve men do.

2. Subventions at the rate of $5 a gross ton a year to all cargo vessels in the foreign trade of the United States and to craft of the deep-sea fisheries, and $6.50 a ton to vessels engaged in our Philippine commerce, the Philippine coastwise law being postponed till 1909. But these cargo vessels, in order to receive subventions, must be held at the disposal of the Government in war, must convey the mails free of charge, be seaworthy and efficient, carry a certain proportion of Americans and naval-reserve men in their crews, and make all ordinary repairs in the United States. Ships lose their subventions if they leave our trade for that of foreign countries, or if, like the Standard Oil craft, they are not engaged exclusively as common carriers.

3. Subventions to new mail lines from the Atlantic coast to Brazil, Argentina, and South Africa; from the South Atlantic coast to Cuba; from the Gulf coast to Cuba, Brazil, Mexico, Central America, and the Isthmus of Panama; from the Pacific coast, via Hawaii, to Japan, China, and the Philippines, and to Mexico, Central America, and the Isthmus of Panama, and from the North Pacific coast direct to Japan, China, and the Philippines, with increased compensation to one existing contract line from the Pacific coast, via Hawaii and Samoa, to Australasia.

All ships receiving subventions must be already American by register or American built, thus excluding the foreign-built fleet of the Atlantic steamship combination. Not one dollar is given to fast passenger and mail lines to Europe. Ships constructed for foreign commerce to receive these subventions can, under the Dingley tariff, be built, equipped, and repaired of materials imported free of duty.

The maximum annual cost of the proposed mail subventions will be about $3,000,000; of the other subventions and retainers to the naval reserve, from $1,550,000, in 1907, to $5,750,000 in 1916. If tonnage taxes are increased, as originally proposed, the legislation will cost nothing the first year, but turn $616,000 into the Treasury, and the annual average net cost for ten years, with the building of new ships, will be $4,625,000.

Against this modest proposition of aid to its foreign-going shipping by the richest country in the world let us set the subventions now given by our foreign competitors to their own shipping:

Great Britain, $6,000,000 per year, not including the new grant to the Cunard Line of $1,100,000.

France pays her steamships $5,000,000 per year in mail subsidies, and in construction and navigation bounties $3,500,000 additional, making a total of $8,500,000 per year.

Germany is now paying about $2,000,000 per year to its two great steamship companies and gives them, besides, very large additional aid in special rates upon the Government railroads to emigrants and freight going by the German steamships. Under this form of assistance the German merchant tonnage has increased from 1,243,000 in 1881 to 3,393,000 in 1905.

Italy pays mail sudsidies and bounties to her steamship companies of about $3,000,000 per year.

Austria-Hungary, with hardly any seacoast, expends on mail and other subsidies about $2,000,000 per year, or nearly twice the amount of ocean-mail payments by the United States.

The little island of Japan, now competing for the commerce of the Pacific and Indian oceans, is giving subventions and bounties to her merchant marine of about $4,000,000 a year, and has thereby increased her merchant shipping from 200,000 tons in 1896 to 830,000 tons in 1904—a more rapid increase in that period than has been made by any other nation in the world.

While these nations have protected, aided, and forced the building of great merchant marines, we have done practically nothing since the civil war to aid, protect, and increase our merchant shipping, until now it has almost disappeared.

We pay over $200,000,000 a year—all but 10 per cent—to foreigners for transporting our foreign commerce, and yet we do nothing to secure for ourselves this great source of national wealth and strength, rightfully ours. Great Britain since 1840 has expended over $250,000,000 in subsidies and bounties to her merchant steamships, and has so held the mastery of the seas.

In the meantime we have protected and aided every other large enterprise for the welfare of our country. We have excluded all others from our coasting and lake trade. We have in a hundred acts of Congress in aid of internal transportation by rail given away over 200,000,000 acres of land, worth now more than $2,000,000,000, and have given in money and local bonds more than $100,000,000. We have spent vast sums and made immense grants in aid of irrigation systems, and we have protected our manufacturers and labor upon shore. Our merchant ships and sailors are alone unaided and unprotected.

We have at this session voted to expend $135,000,000 in constructing a great canal to carry merchant ships from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We will next year, without doubt, vote many millions for the improvement of our rivers and harbors, and this year have already given $100,000,000 to the support and increase of our Navy.

This shipping bill is a measure that partisan politics should not delay.

The necessity of restoring our merchant marine is the most pressing, the most urgent, of those now or lately before the Congress.

When we almost unanimously vote to our Navy $100,000,000, to the construction of a lock canal $135,000,000, while many of us believe in a tide-level canal, and this for the accommodation of the merchant marine, when we have none, let us not hesitate to pass this bill and make the comparatively small appropriation of four and one-half millions per year for our merchant ships and sailors.

It is the only means to give immediate relief and protection to the little remnant of our merchant fleet now about to be crowded from the Atlantic by England, Germany, and France, and from the Pacific by Japan.

May our patriotism overcome our partisanship, as it has at this session in the regulation of interstate commerce, and permit us to join as American citizens in this effort to restore to our great ocean commerce a great fleet of American ships to carry it to and from every port of the seas.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

[Mr. GRIGGS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAPRON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19750—the general adminstrative customs act—and had directed him to report the same with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the amendments.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 1532. An act for the relief of the legal representatives of the late firm of Lèpene & Ferré—to the Committee on War Claims.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 17972.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17972) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River at or near South Omaha, Nebr.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know something about this bill.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. This, Mr. Speaker, is a bill to extend the time within which the South Omaha Railroad and Bridge Company may build a bridge across the Missouri River at South Omaha.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to bills of the following titles:

H. R. 12987. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and

S. 88. An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6523. An act to authorize the Alaska Pacific Railway and Terminal Company to construct a bridge across the Copper River, in the Territory of Alaska;

S. 6209. An act authorizing certain changes in the permanent system of highways in the District of Columbia;

S. 5446. An act for the relief of John Hudgins;

S. 553. An act for the relief of James W. Patterson;

S. 3842. An act for the relief of Mary C. Mayers; and

S. Res. 45. Joint resolution authorizing a commission to examine the battlefields around Petersburg, Va., and report whether it is advisable to establish a battlefield park.

RESOLUTION IN RELATION TO THE BILL H. R. 18891.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately after the adoption hereof it shall be in order to consider in the House as in Committee of the Whole H. R. 18891, "A bill to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph and telephone line in the district of Alaska," and forty minutes shall be allowed for debate thereon, the time to be divided equally between those supporting and those opposing the bill, at the end of which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered and a vote taken on all amendments and the bill to its final passage without delay, intervening motion, or appeal.

Mr. DALZELL. The bill referred to is a bill incorporating a company to build a railroad in Alaska from the Gulf of Alaska, at the head of Cordova Bay, to a point on the Yukon River. It is a bill with which the House is familiar, reported by the Committee on Territories and recommended by the President in his message. Unless some gentleman wants to address the House on the rule, I will ask for the previous question. Does the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] want any time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Which one of the two bills is that?

Mr. DALZELL. It is the bill H. R. 18891.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The one bearing the name of Mr. Higgins?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; we want some time. I want to yield some time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD].

Mr. DALZELL. How much time does the gentleman want? Does the gentleman want time on the rule or on the bill? I will give the gentleman as much time as he wants.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would rather have it on the bill.

Mr. DALZELL. Then let us adopt the rule and go to the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON. As I understand, the rule permits twenty minutes on a side?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. Can not you make that, by unanimous agreement, forty minutes on a side?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Either take twenty minutes now or forty minutes later on. I do not expect to speak at all.

Mr. LLOYD. Let us have forty minutes on a side. If we do not use it, all right.

Mr. HAMILTON. We do not want more than twenty minutes on our side.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And perhaps not on this side.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield to the gentleman twenty minutes.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I would rather have the twenty minutes, if it is to be only twenty minutes, on the bill, because my purpose is to speak on the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON. I understand that the rule provides for forty minutes' debate on the bill.

Mr. LLOYD. I appreciate the fact that the rule provides for forty minutes' debate, twenty minutes on a side, as I understand it. Under the rule there may be forty minutes' debate, and on the rule twenty minutes on a side.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield the gentleman twenty minutes, and then we will not consume any time on this side.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I think I can save twenty minutes, if the gentleman will listen, by asking unanimous consent that the debate on the rule be waived, but that thirty minutes on a side be allowed on the bill itself.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to change the time in the rule from forty minutes to an hour.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALZELL. Now, I ask the previous question on the rule.

The question was taken; and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the resolution was adopted.

The SPEAKER. There is sixty minutes of debate under the special order. The Clerk will first report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill (H. R. 18891) to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph and telephone lines in the district of Alaska.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] as to whether this bill has heretofore been read in the House?

Mr. HAMILTON. I think not.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. PAYNE. Has it ever been read?

Mr. HAMILTON. Perhaps the bill has not been read. I withdraw the request.

The SPEAKER. The bill not having been read to the House, the Clerk will read it:

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18891) to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph and telephone line in the district of Alaska.

Be it enacted, etc., That William L. Bull, Grant B. Schley, Winthrop Smith, William S. McLean, Sabin W. Colton, jr., W. Frederick Snyder, Irving A. Stearns, William M. Barnum, William B. Kurtz, Charles P. Hunt, Ernest Thalmann, James H. Wilson, Samuel M. Felton, John H. McGraw, Andrew F. Burleigh, and all such other persons who shall or may be associated with them, and their successors, are hereby created and erected into a body corporate and politic in deed and in law by the name, style, and title of the "Alaska Railroad Company," and by that name shall have perpetual succession and shall be able to sue and to be sued in all courts of law and equity within the United States and its Territories, and to make and have a common seal. And said corporation is hereby authorized and empowered to lay out, locate, construct, furnish, maintain, and enjoy a continuous railroad, telegraph, and telephone line and branches, with the appurtenances, namely: Beginning at a point on the Gulf of Alaska, at or near the head of Cordova Bay, in the district of Alaska; thence by the most eligible route, as shall be determined by said company, within the territory of the United States, to a point on the Yukon River at or within 2 miles of Eagle; and is hereby vested with all the powers, privileges, and immunities necessary to carry into effect the purposes of this act as herein set forth. The capital stock of said company may consist of 200,000 shares of $100 each, all of the same class and grade, or of such lesser amount as the board of directors of said company may by by-laws determine, which said stock shall in all respects be deemed personal property and shall be transferable in such manner as the by-laws of said corporation shall provide. The persons hereinbefore named are hereby appointed and constituted the first directors of said corporation, to hold their said offices until their successors are duly elected, at the first stockholders' meeting, to be held as hereinafter provided, and qualify, of whom seven shall be a quorum for the transaction of business, which said stockholders' meeting shall be held within six months after the passage of this act. The board of directors of said corporation, after the board hereinbefore constituted as the first board of directors, shall consist of nine persons, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, and said board of directors shall be invested with all the corporate powers of said company. The first meeting of said first board of directors shall be held at such time and place in the city of New York, in the State of New York, as may be designated by a notice delivered to each of said persons hereinbefore named and signed by not less than three of the said persons hereinbefore named, said first meeting to be held not later than ninety days after the passage of this act. Said first board shall organize by the choice from its number of a president, vice-president, secretary, and treasurer, and they shall require from said treasurer such bonds as may be deemed proper, and may, from time to time, change the amount thereof at their discretion. The secretary shall be sworn to the faithful performance of his duties, and such oath shall be entered upon the records of the company, signed by him, with the oath verified thereon. The president and secretary of said board shall in like manner call all other meetings, naming the time and place thereof. It shall be the duty of said first board of directors to open books, or cause books to be opened, at such time and place as they, or a quorum of them, shall determine, within four months after the passage of this act, to receive subscriptions to the capital stock of said corporation. So soon as 5,000 shares shall in good faith be subscribed for, the said president and secretary of said first board of directors shall appoint a time and place for the first meeting of the subscribers to the stock of said company and shall give notice thereof, either personally to each subscriber by mailing to his address, as shown by the books, or in a newspaper published in the city of New York, at least ten days previous to the day of meeting. Such subscribers as shall attend the meeting so called, either in person or by lawful proxy, then and there shall elect by ballot nine directors for said corporation, and in such election each share of said capital stock shall entitle the owner thereof to one vote. The president and secretary of said first board of directors, and in case of their absence or inability any two of the officers of said board, shall act as inspectors of said election and shall certify under their hands the names of the directors elected at said meeting. The said first directors, treasurer, and secretary shall then deliver over to said directors all the property, subscription books, and other books in their possession, and thereupon the duties of said first directors and the officers previously appointed by them shall cease and determine forever. Thereafter the stockholders shall constitute said body politic and corporate. Annual meetings of the stockholders of said corporation for the choice of officers and for the transaction of business shall be holden at such time and place and upon such notice as may be prescribed by the by-laws.

SEC. 2. That the right of way through the lands of the United States in the district of Alaska for a standard-gauge railroad, telegraph, and telephone line is hereby granted to the said Alaska Railroad Company, upon filing due proof of its organization under this act with the Secretary of the Interior, from some point on the Gulf of Alaska at or near the head of Cordova Bay, to be determined by said company, to a point on the Yukon River at or within 2 miles of Eagle, by the most eligible route, the same to be built wholly within American territory, to the extent of 100 feet on each side of the center line of its railroad; also the right to take from the lands of the United States adjacent to the lines of said road materials—earth, stone, and timber—necessary for the construction of said railroad, telegraph, and telephone line; also the right to take for railroad uses, subject to the reservation of all minerals and coal therein, public lands adjacent to said right of way for station buildings, depots, machine shops, side tracks, turnouts, water stations, and terminals, and other legitimate railroad purposes, not to exceed in amount 20 acres for each station, to the extent of one station for each 10 miles of its road, excepting at terminals and junction points, which may include an additional 40 acres, to be limited on navigable waters to 80 rods on the shore line, and with the right to use such additional ground as in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior may be necessary where there are heavy cuts and fills: Provided, That at the ocean terminal of said road, on the Gulf of Alaska, on the Pacific, said terminal lands hereby granted shall include 160 acres of uplands, limited to 160 rods on the shore line, and also the mud flats or tidelands in front thereof: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to give to such railroad company, its lessees, grantees, or assigns, the ownership or use of minerals, including coal, within the limits of its right of way or of the lands hereby granted: And provided further, That all mining operations prosecuted or undertaken within the limits of such right of way or of the lands hereby granted shall, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, be so conducted as not to injure or interfere with the property or operation of said railroad over its said lands and right of way. And when said railroad shall connect with any navigable stream or tide water, such company shall have power to construct, maintain, and operate such piers, wharves, docks, bunkers, and terminals as may be necessary and convenient for connection with water transportation, and for that purpose may take, possess, and use the shores in front of said terminals and extend said piers, wharves, docks, bunkers, and terminals to deep water, subject to the approval and supervision of the Secretary of War. The term "navigable waters" as herein used shall be held to include all tidal waters up to the line of ordinary high-water mark. That all charges for the transportation of freight and passengers on said railroad shall be just, fair, and reasonable, and shall be subject to all the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all other acts which now are or may hereafter be amendatory or supplemental thereof.

SEC. 3. That said company, where its right of way, or where its tracks upon such right of way, passes through any canyon, pass, or defile, shall not prevent any other railroad company from the use and occupancy of said canyon, pass, or defile for the purposes of its road, in common with the road first located, or the crossing of other railroads at grade; and the location of such right of way through any canyon, pass, or defile shall not cause the disuse of any tramway, wagon road, or other public highway now located therein, nor prevent the location through the same of any such tramway, wagon road, or highway, where such tramway, wagon road, or highway may be necessary for the public accommodation; and where any change in the location of such tramway, wagon road, or highway is necessary to permit the passage of such railroad through any canyon, pass, or defile, said railroad company shall, before entering upon the ground occupied by such tramway, wagon road, or highway, cause the same to be reconstructed at its own expense, in the most favorable location, and in as perfect a manner as the original road or tramway: Provided, That such expenses shall be equitably divided between any number of railroad companies occupying and using the same canyon, pass, or defile, and that where the space is limited the United States district court shall require the road first constructed to allow any other railroad or tramway to pass over its track or tracks through such canyon, pass, or defile on such equitable basis as the said court may prescribe; and all shippers shall be entitled to equal accommodations as to the movement of their freight and without discrimination in favor of any person or corporation: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as depriving Congress of the right to regulate the charges for freight, passengers, and wharfage, or telegraph and telephone tolls, either directly or otherwise, as provided by law.

SEC. 4. That where said company shall, in the construction of said railroad, telegraph, and telephone lines, find it necessary to pass over private lands and possessory claims on lands of the United States, in case it can not agree with the owners or claimants for right of way, it may condemn the same in accordance with section 3 of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," approved July 2, 1864.

SEC. 5. That said company, by filing with the Secretary of the Interior a preliminary actual survey and plat of its proposed route, shall have the right, at any time within one year thereafter, to file the map and profile of definite location provided for in this act, and such preliminary survey and plat shall, during the said period of one year from the time of filing the same, have the effect to render all the lands on which said preliminary survey and plat shall pass subject to such right of way.

SEC. 6. That said company shall, within one year from the date of filing said preliminary map of location of its road, as hereinbefore prescribed, whether upon surveyed or unsurveyed lands, file with the register of the land office for the district where such land is located a map and profile of at least a 20-mile section of its road as definitely fixed, and shall therafter each year definitely locate and file a map and profile of such location as aforesaid, but not less than 20 miles additional of its line of road, until the entire road has been thus definitely located, and upon the approval thereof by the Secretary of the Interior the same shall be noted upon the records of said office, and thereafter all such lands over which such right of way shall pass shall be disposed of subject to to such right of way: Provided, That if any 20-mile section of said road shall not be completed within one year after the approval of said map of definite location by the Secretary of the Interior, or if the map of definite location shall not be filed within one year, as herein required, or if the entire road shall not be completed within eight years from the filing of the said preliminary plat of location, the rights herein granted may be forfeited as to any uncompleted portion of said railroad by the President of the United States: And provided further, That if said Alaska Railroad Company shall not complete and put in operation at least 250 miles of its said railroad within five years from the passage of this act, all the lands granted by or purchased under this act shall revert to the United States, except the terminal and station grounds and right of way mentioned in section 2 of this act.

SEC. 7. That said Alaska Railroad shall be constructed in a substantial and workmanlike manner, with all the necessary draws, culverts, bridges, viaducts, crossings, turn-outs, stations, and watering places, and all other appurtenances, including furniture and rolling stock, equal in all respects to railroads of the first class when prepared for business, with rails of the best quality, and there shall be constructed a telegraph and telephone line of the most substantial and improved description to be operated along the entire line: Provided, That the said company shall not charge the Government of the United States higher rates than they do individuals for like transportation and telegraph and telephone service. And it shall be the duty of the said Alaska Railroad Company to permit any other railroad which shall be authorized to be built in Alaska to form running and track connections with it on fair and equitable terms.

SEC. 8. That the provisions of this act, except the limit of time for completing the main line, shall extend to such branch lines of railroad as said company may desire to construct, maintain, and operate within eight years from the passage of this act.

SEC. 9. That the company shall have the power to borrow money and secure the same by mortgage or otherwise.

SEC. 10. That in addition to the terminal lands hereinbefore granted for railroad purposes there be, and is hereby, granted to said Alaska Railroad Company 2,560 acres of the public lands which are not coal lands or mineral in character, to be selected by said company by legal subdivisions, together with the mud flats or tidelands in front thereof at its terminus or near the head of Cordova Bay, for which said 2,560 acres of public lands said company shall pay to the United States $2.50 per acre. Said lands shall be selected in a compact body with a water front on Cordova Bay not exceeding 2 miles. Said Alaska Railroad Company shall pay the cost of surveying the same, as now provided by law in Alaska. Said company shall have the right to select lands claimed or occupied, provided it shall obtain from the claimant or occupant an assignment or relinquishment of his rights, if such lands were claimed or occupied prior to the passage of this act, which assignment or relinquishment in writing shall be filed with the survey and selection of such lands in the office of the register of the United States land office in the district where such lands are situate. Said company shall have the right to improve the said mud flats or tidelands hereby granted for purposes of trade, commerce, and manufacture, in accordance with plans submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War: Provided, That ample streets and ways of access to the water front and the harbor area hereinafter provided for shall be reserved to the public by said plans and improvements: Provided further, That the public shall have the right to use all wharves, docks, slips, and waterways erected upon the said harbor area, in front of the lands granted by this section, upon payment of reasonable charges therefor, to be regulated by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That the Secretary of War shall, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, cause a harbor area to be established along the water front in front of the lands granted by this section at said terminus, at or near the head of Cordova Bay, not exceeding 800 feet in width, which said harbor area shall be reserved in perpetuity for the public, and beyond the outer line of which it shall be unlawful to erect any pier, wharf, dock, or other structure, and said harbor area is hereby reserved from the mud flats or tidelands in this section granted: Provided further, That suitable reservations shall be made for public buildings, schools, and parks when said lands are platted, to be approved by the Secretary of War: And provided further, That any other railroad company that may desire to make its terminus at Cordova Bay shall have the right to condemn for rights of way and terminal purposes, in the manner provided by law, any of the lands granted by this section and not reserved as a harbor area. Said Alaska Railroad Company is hereby given the right to confine the waters of Cordova Creek to one channel, and to straighten and deepen the same.

SEC. 11. That there be, and is hereby, granted to said Alaska Railroad Company one section of coal lands in Alaska, to be selected by said company, for which coal lands said company shall pay to the United States $10 per acre. If the lands selected are claimed or occupied, they may, nevertheless, be entered by said company, provided said company shall procure and file in the local land office, when such entry is made, an assignment or relinquishment by the claimant or occupant.

SEC. 12. That said Alaska Railroad and any and all branches it may construct, or any part thereof, shall be a post route and military road, subject to the use of the United States for postal, military, naval, and all other Government service, and also subject to such regulations as Congress may impose restricting the charges for such Government transportation: Provided, That said company shall be exempt from license or other tax during the construction of the road: Provided, That the granting of this charter by Congress shall not be construed so as to prevent the taxation of the franchise and property of said company by any State or Territory constructed out of the district of Alaska or any part thereof.

SEC. 13. That the directors of said company shall make to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor an annual report of their receipts and expenditures, verified by the affidavits of the President and at least five of the directors, and shall also include the name and post-office address of its stockholders and the number of shares owned by each.

SEC. 14. That the directors chosen by the stockholders in pursuance of the first section of this act shall, so soon as may be after their election, elect from their own number a president and vice-president, and said board of directors shall, from time to time and so soon as may be after their election, choose a treasurer and secretary, wh shall hold their offices at the will and pleasure of the board of directors. The treasurer and secretary shall give such bonds with such security as the board may from time to time require. The secretary shall, before entering upon his duties, be sworn to the faithful discharge thereof, and said oath shall be made a matter of record upon the books of the corporation. No person shall be a director of said company unless he shall be a stockholder and qualified to vote for directors at the election at which he shall be chosen.

SEC. 15. That the president, vice-president, and directors shall hold their offices for the period indicated in the by-laws of said company, not exceeding three years, respectively, and until others are chosen in their place and qualify. In case it shall so happen that an election of directors shall not be made on any day appointed by the by-laws of said company, the corporation shall not for that reason be deemed to be dissolved, but such election may be held on any day within three months thereafter, which shall be appointed by the directors. The directors, of whom five, including the president, shall be a quorum for the transaction of business, shall have full power to make and prescribe such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they shall deem needful and proper touching the disposition and management of the stock, property, estate, and effects of the company, the transfer of shares, the duties and conduct of their officers and servants touching the election and meeting of directors, and all matters whatsoever which may appertain to the concerns of said company. And the said board of directors may have full power to fill any vacancy or vacancies that may occur from any cause or causes from time to time in their said board; and the said board of directors shall have power to appoint such engineers, agents, and subordinates as may from time to time be necessary to carry into effect the objects of the company, and to do all acts and things touching the location and construction of said road.

SEC. 16. That it shall be lawful for the directors of said company to receive payment in cash, or in property at its cash value, upon all subscriptions received of all subscribers at such times and in such proportions and on such conditions as they shall deem to be necessary to completely carry out the objects of this act. Sixty days' previous notice shall be given of the payments required and of the time and place of payment by publishing a notice once a week in one daily newspaper in the city of New York, and by mailing a notice thereof to each subscriber from whom such payment is due, addressed to him at the address given upon the books of the company. And in case any stockholder shall neglect or refuse to pay, in pursuance of such notice, the stock held by such person may be sold at public auction to the highest bidder, and the company may bid therefor to the amount due it upon such subscription, subject to the condition that the board of directors may allow any stockholder to redeem his stock when so sold on such terms as they may prescribe.

SEC. 17. That all lawful claims of laborers, contractors, subcontractors, or material men for labor performed or material furnished in the construction of the railroad, telegraph, and telephone lines shall be a first lien thereon and take precedence of any mortgage or other lien.

SEC. 18. That the right of way herein and hereby authorized shall not be assigned or transferred, in any form whatever, prior to the construction and completion of at least one-fourth of the proposed mileage of said railroad, telephone, and telegraph, as indicated by the map of definite location, except by mortgages or other liens that may be given or secured thereon to aid the construction thereof.

SEC 19. Congress may at any time add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has thirty minutes, and the Chair understands the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] to have thirty minutes.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to incorporate a railroad company for the construction of a railroad from Cordova Bay to Eagle, on the Yukon, in Alaska.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this Government is not justified in aiding a private enterprise except where great public benefit will result. In his message at the opening of the Fifty-eighth Congress the President made this recommendation:

> In my judgment it is especially important to aid in such a manner as is just and feasible in the construction of a trunk line of railway to connect the Gulf of Alaska and the Yukon River through American territory. This would be most beneficial to the development of the resources of the Territory and of the comfort and welfare of its people.

In his annual message of December 5, 1905, the President repeated his former recommendation in the following language:

> The Government should aid in the construction of a railroad from the Gulf of Alaska to the Yukon River in American territory.

Mr. Speaker, when this question first came before the Committee on Territories, the idea of Government aid took shape in the suggestion that a guarantee of construction bonds should be given by the Government. To this the Committee on Territories did not feel they could accede, and after several weeks of hearings we finally determined on a plan to aid in the construction of a great trunk line as provided for in this bill and as shown on the map before the House. As a part of the general plan of Government aid, the committee proposes also aid in the construction of a railroad now partly constructed, known as the "Alaska Central Railroad," which is projected from the town of Seward, on Resurrection Bay, northward to Fairbanks, on the Tanana River. The distance from Seward to Fairbanks is 463 miles. The Alaska Central Railroad Company, notwithstanding the fact that they have expended two and a half million dollars, have only been able to construct up to about mile 45. It is estimated that the railroad will cost upward of $20,000,000. As, of course, is known to Members of the House, this country proposed to be traversed by this railroad is utterly wild and uninhabited except that there are occasional mining camps. The line proposed in the bill that is before the House, which extends from Cordova Bay——

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Before you get away from the first line, has the Government heretofore made any contribution of land or aid in any way?

Mr. HAMILTON. There are very few roads constructed in Alaska. There are 45 miles of the Alaska Central constructed, and there is a little road between Fairbanks and Chena, 26 miles long, and there are three short lines up in the Seward Peninsula, the shortest of which is 8 miles long and the longest of which is 20 miles long.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. A charter authorizes the construction of a line up in here [indicating].

Mr. HAMILTON. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. They have a charter. Now, is there any provision in that charter authorizing the acquisition or acquirement of public lands?

Mr. HAMILTON. There is a provision in a bill which will be brought before the House to give them certain tracts of 160 acres each at certain points mentioned in the bill.

Mr. LACEY. It was increased to 160 at division points.

Mr. HAMILTON. And 160 acres at the northern terminus of this road.

Necessarily, gentlemen of the House have been much occupied with other matters, and very few Members, I take it, have had an opportunity to make any special study of conditions in Alaska. Now, there are practically no railroads in Alaska. I think I can remember them all, and will try to give them to the House.

The White Pass and Yukon road is a Canadian enterprise, and is a road 112 miles long, running from the head of the Lynn Canal up to White Horse. Twenty miles of that road only are in American territory. Another road, the one I have been endeavoring to describe, the Alaska Central, has constructed only 45 miles of its road, and is having great difficulty to get farther, owing to difficulty in the sale of its bonds, and it has been before the Committee on the Territories and before the Public Lands Committee asking for aid. There is another short road up here from Nome. I think that road is 20 miles long. There is another short road called the "Solomon River Railroad," which, I think, is 17 miles long.

Mr. LACEY. Thirteen miles.

Mr. HAMILTON. Thirteen miles long, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] suggests. And there is another little narrow-gauge road, 26 miles long, running out from Fairbanks to Chena.

Now, here is a vast territory. Alaska is nearly as large as the whole of the United States east of the Mississippi River. It has wonderful possibilities in a mineral way, and it is contended by those who have made a study of the conditions that it has all of the possibilities, from an agricultural standpoint, that Finland has realized. Finland, if I remember correctly, has about one-fourth the area of Alaska, and about one-third of that area is marsh and lake. Another third is forest, and the other third supports a population of 3,000,000 people. Now, it is contended that Alaska has all of the agricultural possibilities of Finland, and it is contended that we ought to aid in the opening up of the internal resources of Alaska, both mineral and agricultural.

Mr. HINSHAW. Along the line of the proposed railroad what agricultural possibilities are there?

Mr. HAMILTON. There are agricultural possibilities in the Copper River Valley. I might as well take that up now. The Copper River Valley is a rich valley. They say there are deposits of copper there rich enough to make another crop of millionaires, and to the east of the Copper River Valley are extensive coal fields.

Another thing I want to call the attention of the House to: We are paying for coal used on our warships on the Pacific Ocean, according to the hearings before our committee, over one million dollars per year, and the coal so purchased is Welsh coal. We are buying Welsh coal because it is said to be cheaper by reason of water transportation than Pocahontas coal, which has to be transported across the continent. Now, here are these coal deposits east of the Copper River Valley, and here are the coal deposits in the Matanuska Valley, and it is said that coal from these fields can be sold at $7 a ton delivered at the seaboard if railroads are constructed, whereas our Government is now paying $12 and $14 a ton for this Welch coal. There would be a material saving to the Government.

Now, another thing: How do we get into Alaska? The only ways of getting into Alaska to-day are, first, by way of this White Pass and Yukon Railroad to White Horse, then down the Lewes River, thence down the Yukon River, and the distance from Skagway, the southern terminus of the White Pass and Yukon Railroad, to Fairbanks, is 1,500 miles. The Yukon River is over 3,000 miles long. The other way to get into this country is around by sea up to Norton Sound. There the large ships have to unload, and their freight is taken into smaller boats and carried up the Yukon. From St. Michael, near the mouth of the Yukon River, to Fairbanks is a distance of 1,000 miles. It takes a month to transport mail to interior points of Alaska. A third route is by trail northward from Valdez.

Another proposition, gentlemen: The average cost of transporting freight to water points in the interior of Alaska is $100 per ton, and off from waterways the freight rates are prohibitive. They are all the way from $2 to $10 per ton per mile. As an illustration, at Tanana Crossing, 300 miles north of the Gulf of Alaska and 200 miles south of the Yukon River, sugar, flour, and salt are each 75 cents per pound, regardless of the real value of the commodity. The price of the commodity is fixed by the cost of transportation. One other illustration: A gentleman appeared before our committee from the town of Fairbanks, and he was intending to take into Fairbanks some motors to be used in connection with an electric lighting plant. Fairbanks is a town of something like 9,000 inhabitants. He said that the cost of the freight on these motors would be 50 cents per pound, or $1,000 per ton.

Now, it is said to be impossible for the miners to work a placer mine which does not pay upward of $10 or $20 a day because of the cost of living. A great deal of the mineral wealth of Alaska is not being utilized or developed because of lack of transportation. It is said to be absolutely impossible to work quartz mines which are not near navigable waters, because they can not get machinery to them. Of course, so far as water transportation is concerned, they can get around the coast of Alaska and up the Yukon River, but in these valleys south of the Yukon there is great mineral wealth and there are great agricultural possibilities.

I will, if I am permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, put in some details as to these valleys.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. What about the necessity for snow sheds?

Mr. HAMILTON. I judge others by myself. I had a misapprehension of Alaska. Most people think that it is nothing but a large iceberg with a polar bear on top of it, some bare ground showing here and there. Along south of the Coast Range here the snow is deep at times. North of this Coast Range the snow is seldom more than 3 feet deep. Indeed, the testimony before the committee is that in the Sushitna Valley the blue grass grows. I don't know whether it is the same kind that grows in the State of the gentleman from Kentucky, but it is said that it grows there in its natural state 5 feet in height; and a gentleman testified before us that where the moose had run the grass was so high that a man sitting on horseback could not reach the top of it. Horses turned out in the winter there do well and come out in the spring in good condition.

Now, gentlemen, I can only touch briefly on these different points. I only want to show, or try to show, the absolute necessity of providing some kind of transportation. In regard to this railroad, I want to state that the committee has given very careful consideration to it. I admit that when I went into the consideration of it I was prejudiced against the idea of Government aid. It was quoted to us that we had given aid in the Philippines, and I insisted that that ought not to be treated as a precedent, because the railroad aid given in the Philippines was not directly given by the Federal Government, but was authorized by the Federal Government to be given by the Philippine government. But, gentlemen, we did give Government aid to railroad construction in the Philippines; that is, we put the moral strength of this Government behind a guaranty by the Philippine government of construction bonds of railroads in the Philippine Islands. After long consideration, a majority of the committee finally determined that if we could aid in railroad construction in the Philippine Islands, 7,000 miles away, we could do some little thing for our own American enterprise in our own country.

Now, what have we proposed to do? We discussed it day after day, and finally we said, "Gentlemen, we will incorporate you, and we will give you some aid; we will allow you to buy; we will not give you any land, except that we will increase the terminal grant which the law gives you from 60 to 160 acres, but we will allow you to buy some land." Gentlemen will remember that the railroad law of Alaska makes provision for the construction of railroads in Alaska. It gives 100 feet on each side of the center of the right of way and 20 acres for stations and 60 acres for terminals. Now, they want to build a town at the south end of this railroad. We said, "We will let you buy four sections of land at $2.50 an acre, the Government price. We will not give it to you, and you can not take that land so as to control the water front; you can have only 2 miles of that water front." It was determined further to leave open to the public forever 800 feet along the water front of the proposed town. They said they would like to be permitted to buy the land now, because if they had to take it under the homestead law they could not acquire title for five years, and if we gave them a chance to do this they could acquire title at once and build a city up there. At present this land has practically no value. These gentlemen are optimists. It is an inhospitable country; but they say that they will build a city there. Now, what do we do further? They go along up this right of way and there are coal fields. We say that for the purpose of running your road, and for no other purpose, you can buy at $10 an acre a section of this land. We do not give the land. Let no gentleman here get the idea that we are giving away this land. We say, You can buy a section of land at $10 an acre, the Government price.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague whether any of the roads now under construction or already built in this country have been specially chartered by the Government?

Mr. HAMILTON. No.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. None of them.

Mr. HAMILTON. Perhaps I ought to say, by way of preliminary explanation—and I am hurrying a little—that under the law a preliminary survey has to be filed with the Secretary of the Interior, together with articles of association. Some roads have filed these preliminary surveys and articles of association, but they have seldom gone beyond that. I believe one road has done some little work out of Valdez—that is to say, it is said that they have done some digging. But they have gone no further. Another thing I want to say is that the Secretary of the Interior complained of the general provision for forfeiture which was originally incorporated in the bill following existing law, and I went to the Secretary of the Interior, and I said that we wanted to be careful about this question, and he suggested that we place the right of forfeiture in the President of the United States, so that if the railroad company does not do as it is required the President can exercise that right.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. The gentleman hurried away from the coal proposition. How many acres of land at $10 an acre are they limited to?

Mr. HAMILTON. One section.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. On the whole road?

Mr. HAMILTON. Yes. They say that the coal is owned by other people, and they might not be able to buy it, or that the other people might not open up the coal fields, and they would have no right to do it. We give them the right to buy, but if others are in possession they must buy from them also. That is a double burden that we put upon them.

I desire to say another thing. The general law says that they shall complete their surveys and shall finish their road in four years. Obviously, gentlemen, it is utterly impossible to construct that road, 525 miles long, in four years. Everybody can see that. So we say that we will give them eight years to construct this road; but if they do not construct 250 miles of that road in five years, they shall forfeit all the lands that we have given them the right to purchase.

Mr. HINSHAW. Does this bill provide for any contribution of money from the Government?

Mr. HAMILTON. Not a cent.

Mr. HINSHAW. Or for a guaranty of any bonds?

Mr. HAMILTON. Not a bond.

Mr. HINSHAW. Then there is nothing whatever in the way of construction except the sale of these lands at a specified price?

Mr. HAMILTON. That is all; and I desire to say that those lands are not worth 2½ cents an acre to-day, and never will be worth anything until transportation companies go in there. I say that it is patriotic for us to help the construction of these railroads. I have gone over it day after day, and I believe in it, and I believe we ought to do it. The President wanted us to aid the construction of railroads, and we said if we could put a trunk line up from Cordova Bay to Eagle, on the Yukon, and put another trunk line from Resurrection Bay to Fairbanks, it would be a great help to Alaska. All of the Members can see for themselves, on the map, that when you do that you have constructed two great trunk lines which open up the internal resources of Alaska. Then, in the course of time—I may be visionary about this—we shall see another great railroad constructed across here, from Fairbanks northwesterly into the Nome country, about 1,000 miles; and we did authorize a preliminary survey or a trail survey this year looking to the ultimate construction of such a railroad.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. Yes.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Under the forfeiture clause of this bill, I believe this railroad is given eight years within which to construct the road.

Mr. HAMILTON. Yes; the 525 miles of it.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Under the general law they would have only four years.

Mr. HAMILTON. Yes.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Is it not a fact that this bill will, to that extent, give this railroad an advantage over every other road that is proposed to be constructed into Alaska under the general law?

Mr. HAMILTON. I will try to answer the gentleman. I do not think so, for this reason: Alaska, as I said, is a vast territory and certainly there is room for all railroads who want to construct through there. The great difficulty is that the people can not get capital to go in there to construct these railroads, but whenever any other railroad wants to go through any canyon, pass, or defile occupied by this road, as the gentleman knows, we have provided that that railroad may cross this road, and that that canyon, pass, or defile shall be open to all other roads. Outside of this, there is all this vast territory open to all other railroads.

Mr. LACEY rose.

Mr. HAMILTON. I must yield to some other gentleman. If you will permit me later, I may take the floor.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I understand about the defiles, etc., but if this road is given four years in which to complete the line, and under the general law all others will be given four years, does not that give a very decided advantage over every other one?

Mr. HAMILTON. Does the gentleman remember we have extended the time of filing definite surveys to three or four of the other roads here?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. But they have to come up by special act of Congress to get an extension of time.

Mr. HAMILTON. We always grant that, and this does not give any special advantage, in my judgment, and I think when my friend goes over it carefully he will agree it does not give any special advantage.

Alaska was acquired from Russia, the transfer being made October 18, 1867. Appropriation for the purchase price, $7,200,000, was made in 1868.

The award of the Commission appointed pursuant to the treaty signed January 24, 1903, to define the boundary between Alaska and Canada, established a line as follows:

Beginning at Cape Muzon at the South point of Dall Island; thence east to Wales Island at the entrance of Portland canal; thence north around Wales Island and northward up the center of Portland Canal to the head thereof; thence north to the fifty-sixth parallel; thence following the crest of the mountains parallel to the coast, or following a line parallel with the sinuosities of the coast and 10 marine leagues therefrom where the mountains exceed that distance from the coast, to the one hundred and forty-first degree of west longitude; thence north on the one hundred and forty-first degree to the Arctic Ocean.

The area of Alaska is about 580,000 square miles, or 37,120,000 acres. It cost the Government in 1867 about 19 cents an acre.

The permanent white population of the Territory was estimated by the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Territories who visited there in 1903 to be 20,000. The governor of Alaska in his report in 1903 estimated the white population at 26,550, and in his report for 1905 states that it has not materially increased in the last year.

Witnesses before the Committee on the Territories this year, having intimate knowledge of conditions in Alaska, estimate the permanent white population at from 35,000 to 50,000.

Alaska is a partially organized Territory, having a governor and secretary, but no legislature. It is divided into three Federal judicial districts. It is a customs district and there are local land offices.

With reference to the larger towns in the Territory, ex-Gov. A. P. Swineford said before the Committee on the Territories February 23, 1906:

> Fairbanks has, I think, the largest population at the present time. I think that in the winter season the population of that place is probably about 5,000, and, including the mining camps and surrounding district, I should say that the population is approximately 15,000. Nome is probably the next largest, having a permanent winter population in the neighborhood of 3,000, and, in addition, 10,000 persons in the surrounding camps. Then comes Juneau, with a population of 2,500. I can estimate that town's population pretty accurately, because the census is taken there nearly every year, though the effort is to make the count less than 1,500, because of the graded liquor license. Next comes Douglas, with a population of, say, 2,000; then Treadwell, with 1,500; then Skagway, with 1,500; Ketchikan, about 1,500; Haines and Fort Seward, 1,000; Wrangell, about 1,200, and Sitka, with about 1,000. Seward probably has a population of 1,500. I would not like to have any Valdez man hear me estimating the population of that place at less than 1,500 or even 2,000.

Since its acquisition, the total receipts from Alaska to and including 1903, exceeded by $999,041.63 the total expenditures of all descriptions, including such exceptional items as expense of revenue vessels, relief of people in mining regions, and Bering Sea awards and commissions.

The commerce of Alaska as compared with that of other possessions of the United States is indicated in a table submitted by ex-Governor Swineford as follows:

Total value of domestic merchandise shipped from the States to Alaska during the year ending June 30, 1905	$11,227,619
Total value of domestic merchandise shipped from Alaska to States during the year ending June 30, 1905	10,698,694
Gold shipments, same period	9,067,325
Total	30,993,638
Gold production for calendar year ending December 31, 1905	15,000,000
Shipments to Hawaii, same period	11,643,519
Shipments to Porto Rico, same period	13,387,457
Shipments to Philippines, same period	6,198,384
From Hawaii to States	36,069,109
From Porto Rico to States	15,527,265
From Philippines to States	12,657,904

MINING.

The largest part of the wealth of Alaska is in its minerals, chief among which now is gold.

The production of gold has increased from $2,000,000 in 1895 to $15,000,000 in 1905, and the total production for that period has been $70,898,000.

About four-fifths of the gold produced is from placer mining, the balance being taken from lode deposits.

Necessarily quartz mining is greatly restricted, in fact prohibited except on navigable water, by the lack of transportation facilities capable of handling heavy mining machinery.

Placer mining is limited to regions where the deposits are sufficiently rich to make return for expensive hand work.

When railroads bring in hydraulic machinery, claims can be profitably worked which can not be worked at all now by reason of physical conditions or are neglected for richer fields.

Under present conditions and by present methods, only gravels carrying at least $2 or $3 per cubic yard can be profitably mined. When means of transportation permit the bringing in of hydraulic machinery, dirt carrying 50 cents and even less per cubic yard can be very profitably worked.

The productive gold districts of Alaska may be divided into three general belts.

The first is parallel with the coast of the Gulf of Alaska, starting at the extreme southeastern point of Alaska on Portland Channel and following the coast to where it bends to the southwest.

This region contains practically all of the producing quartz mines of the Territory, including the Treadwell, at Douglas, which has been in operation for many years and now runs about 900 stamps.

Quartz properties have been located farther west in the coast belt, and Mr. John E. Ballaine, of Seward, Alaska, stated before the Committee on the Territories that last summer a ledge of quartz was discovered in the Kenai Peninsula, east of Cook Inlet, near the line of the Alaska Central Railroad, ore from which assayed as high as $1,600 a ton, and which, it was believed, would average $100 a ton.

Mr. Ballaine further refers to the statement of Mr. Purinton, a mining engineer, who asserted that, in his opinion, Crow Creek Valley, on the north side of Turnagain Arm, Cook Inlet, contains not less than $125,000,000 in gold, which, however, will have to be mined by heavy hydraulic machinery, which can not now, for lack of transportation facilities, be taken into that country.

Some of the smaller placer districts are contained within this coast belt.

The second gold belt extends westward from the international boundary near the Klondike region, and includes the rich camps in the Fortymile and Tanana districts, among them Fairbanks. This belt has an area of approximately 20,000 square miles.

Although the Fairbanks camps alone sent out more than $6,000,000 in gold in 1905, placer mining is limited and quartz mining practically prohibited by lack of transportation.

The third gold-bearing belt extends westward from the Upper Koyukuk, near Coldfoot, above the Arctic Circle, to the Seward Peninsula. For much of the distance between these extremities, it is said, the gold-bearing gravel is covered by "younger" rock.

The placer mines of the Seward Peninsula have produced gold to the amount of $30,000,000.

One quartz mine near Solomon in the Seward Peninsula has been in successful operation for some years, and the development of the field generally has been more rapid because of proximity to tide water.

It has been stated that South Africa is producing $100,000,000 a year in gold, and it is at the same time asserted that the fields in that country are not so rich as those of Alaska.

There is no room for doubt that the extension of placer mining and the inauguration of quartz mining throughout Alaska are dependent almost wholly upon improved transportation.

COPPER.

Copper ores are known to exist in four distinct districts in Alaska.

Two of these districts, one at the southern end of Prince of Wales Island and the other on the east shore of Prince William Sound, being on tide water and having ready access to ocean transportation, are on a profitable commercial basis and produced copper last year to the value of $600,000.

The third copper district is in the Chitina Valley on the southern slope of the Wrangell Mountains.

The deposits are chiefly sulphide ores, found along a contact of greenstone and limestone.

Tests by drilling and surface investigations indicate the existence of extensive bodies of rich ore.

The transportation conditions which restrict gold operations absolutely prohibit copper mining away from the seaboard.

The Chitina field is now reached only by a horse trail 150 or 200 miles long.

The fourth copper district is located in the region of the headwaters of the Tanana, Copper, and White rivers.

It has not been extensively explored, but it is believed that copper exists in commercial quantities.

This district, even more than the Chitina, is dependent upon railroad transportation for development.

COAL.

Coal fields are distributed throughout Alaska. The fields now known in Alaska are equal in area to the fields of Pennsylvania, and only about one-fifth of the Territory has been explored.

While there are some coals of very high grade, probably the greater part are of low grade, lignitic in character, and with a small percentage of fixed carbon.

The total coal production for 1905 was about 2,000 tons.

Lack of transportation is of course more severely felt than in the case of gold or copper, coal away from the seacoast or not reached by a railroad, being of no immediate commercial interest and only valuable as a possible future fuel supply.

Anthracite and semianthracite coal is found in two localities principally, on Bering River, east of the mouth of the Copper River and about 25 miles from Controller Bay. This is sometimes known as "Kayak coal."

This field covers an area of about 70 square miles, of which 25 square miles is anthracite and 45 square miles is semianthracite and semibituminous coking coal.

Doctor Martin, of the Geological Survey, says the quantity is great and the quality high.

The serious obstacle to the development of this field is the fact that although a railroad could easily be built from tide water to it, an artificial harbor would have to be constructed at great cost. Otherwise a railroad must be built from some harbor on Prince William Sound, a distance of practically 100 miles. The Alaska Railroad Company, which the pending bill proposes to assist, intends to reach the coal field by this route.

The second valuable field lies in the valley of the Matanuska River, which flows southwest into Knik Arm, at the head of Cook Inlet. Doctor Martin estimates that this field has an area of from seventy to several hundred square miles. The coals are anthracite, semibituminous, coking, and low-grade bituminous. Both quantity and quality indicate a promising future for the field.

The coal is about 50 miles from tide water, in Cook Inlet.

This field will doubtless be reached by a branch of the Alaska Central Railroad, the main line of which runs north from Seward, and when finished will extend around the head of Knik Arm and up the Sushitna Valley to the vicinity of Fairbanks, a distance of 463 miles.

Next in quality to the coal of the Bering and Matanuska fields appears to be a semibituminous coal found in the vicinity of Cape Lisburne, north of Bering Strait, in about latitude 69°.

This coal is of fair quality, but because the coast is ice locked all but two or three months in the year and because there is no harbor, the coal is not now of commercial value.

There is a small mine on Chicago Creek, on the north side of Seward Peninsula, the output of which, although a low-grade lignite, has sold readily at $10 a ton.

Explorers and prospectors have reported large coal fields on the Arctic slope of northern Alaska, but these fields are too remote to be of present commercial interest.

Bituminous and lignite coals are found in the valleys of the Yukon, Tanana, and Koyukuk rivers, in the Alaska Peninsula, at Kachemak Bay, on the east shore of Cook Inlet; in southeastern Alaska, and in small quantities in various other places.

The two coal fields of immediate commercial and national interest are those on the Bering and Matanuska rivers.

The quantity of coal in each is apparently great and of high quality.

The officers of the Geological Survey say that in quality this coal ranks with Pocahontas coal of West Virginia, and the Welsh coal used by the Navy, and which is necessarily of high quality.

It should be understood that practically no coal, except bituminous coal unfit for use by the Navy, is found on the Pacific coast outside of Alaska.

The Government can buy Welsh coal cheaper at Puget Sound than it can buy coal from the Pennsylvania fields because of cheap water transportation and the advantage of return cargoes.

The Navy uses on the Pacific stations about 100,000 tons of coal a year, which costs an average price of from $12 to $14 a ton, or considerably over $1,000,000.

Gentlemen representing railroad companies seeking to reach the coal fields in question say that when railroads are completed coal of a grade fully equal to that required by the Navy can be delivered at tide water for from $6 to $7 per ton.

Aside from the interest which the Government should take in the opening of Alaska, it has, so far at least as coal is concerned, a direct financial interest in the deveolpment of railroad transportation, without which coal is inaccessible.

OIL.

The Geological Survey, in a bulletin issued in 1905, reports indications of petroleum in three districts in Alaska—at Controller Bay, just east of the mouth of the Copper River; at Dry Bay and Oil Bay, on the west shore of Cook Inlet, and at Cold Bay, on the east coast of the Alaska Peninsula, opposite the lower end of Kodiak Island.

There are seepages and other surface indications of oil in all these districts, and wells have been drilled, but results have not yet demonstrated that the fields have commercial value.

TIN.

Extensive placer and quartz deposits of tin have been discovered in Seward Peninsula, in the vicinity of Cape Prince of Wales. At least one mine, the Bartels, is in operation at Twin City, Cape Prince of Wales. Assays show values of from $12 to $800 a ton of ore.

Numerous other ledges of tin ore have been located, and assays show high commercial value.

It is estimated by experts that the tin fields cover an area of at least 1,200 square miles, with at least $25,000,000 in ore in sight.

FISHERIES.

The coast line of Alaska is equal to the circumference of the globe at the equator, and it has been stated that there is good fishing for every mile. However, there has been little fishing for commercial purposes north of Bristol Bay.

While the fisheries of Alaska are almost entirely salmon fisheries, still halibut, cod, and herring are caught in large numbers. The red salmon is the principal commercial variety.

That part of the coast where fishing is carried on has been divided for convenience into three general districts—the Bering Sea district (Bristol Bay), the central Alaska district, and the southeastern Alaska district.

Some knowledge of the peculiar habits of the salmon is necessary to an understanding of the methods pursued in fishing.

Salmon eggs are laid in the upper waters of streams flowing into the ocean. It is stated that a female red salmon, the most common variety, lays about 3,000 eggs, a very small proportion of which are hatched, and that only a small proportion of fish hatched reach maturity.

Hon. C. W. Dorr, of the Alaska Packers' Association, states, and his statements are confirmed by Dr. B. W. Evermann, scientific expert of the Bureau of Fisheries, that in his opinion a young salmon remains in the waters in which it is hatched for about a year, and then, being what is known as a "fingerling," it goes down the stream to the ocean, and there utterly disappears for a period varying, in the opinion of experts, from four to seven years. It is believed that it goes into deep ocean water. Experts are not able to tell what becomes of it, but at the end of the period stated, having reached maturity, it returns, by unerring instinct, to the stream where it was hatched, to propagate.

From the time it enters fresh water it practically ceases to eat, and as it passes up the stream over rocks and falls and through rapids it becomes weaker and weaker. It may die before it reaches the spawning grounds in the headwaters and float back downstream, but, at best, it reaches the grounds exhausted and nearly dead. The females deposit the eggs, which are fertilized by the males, whereupon, within a few days, both male and female die and float downstream. The Pacific salmon never goes to the ocean a second time alive.

The salmon deteriorates in commercial value as it advances up the stream, and inasmuch as it never returns from the headwaters alive it must be taken for food purposes at or near the mouths of the streams, and it is there that the fishermen pursue their occupation. The run of salmon up the streams in Alaska lasts usually about a month, and that month ordinarily is July, although seasons vary.

There are about 100 streams which are fished in Alaska. Canneries are located at convenient points on or near them. The fishing fleets come up from the States, cans are made, the fish are canned, and the cans are cased—48 in a case—at the canneries.

The fish are taken almost entirely by three methods—seines, traps, and gill nets.

The great number of salmon in northern waters is indicated by the statement of Mr. Dorr before the Committee on the Territories, that he had on one occasion visited the Fraser River, in British Columbia, during the salmon run, when there were set in the river no less than 525 miles of netting, and it was incomprehensible how a fish going up the stream could escape the obstructions; yet Mr. Dorr asserts that above the nets the fish were so thick in the river as to interfere with each other in their progress upstream.

Numerous similar instances are of record.

Inasmuch as salmon never return to the ocean after going to the spawning grounds, such as are caught are caught on their way to their natural death, and the future supply of fish is only reduced to the extent that captured fish are prevented from spawning. Some streams in Alaska show failure; others which have been fished for twenty-five years show no perceptible decrease of supply.

Admitting, however, that reproduction must be limited by the capture of numerous fish, it is agreed by fishing companies and by officials of the Bureau of Fisheries that the supply of salmon can best be maintained by hatcheries. Already there are several such hatcheries in Alaska, and it is stated by Howard M. Kutchin, special agent of the Bureau of Fisheries for Alaska salmon fisheries, in his report for 1905, that in the last year 109,500,000 young salmon were released from hatcheries maintained by certain of the fishing companies.

According to the same report of Special Agent Kutchin, 45 corporations, firms, and individuals were engaged in salmon fishing in Alaska in 1905. The capital stock of these concerns was $11,371,150, the value of their plants was $5,728,978, and the value of the salmon pack for 1905 was $6,563,655.

Ten thousand six hundred and forty-five men were employed at wages amounting to $2,231,119.

Sixty-eight traps, 211 seines, and 1,154 gill nets were in operation.

FURS.

Furs and fur skins were shipped from Alaska during the year ending June 30, 1905, to the value of $494,764.

The skins taken are mainly polar, black, and brown bear; black wolf; white, red, blue, and silver-gray foxes; badger, beaver, sable, and seal.

AGRICULTURE.

Agriculture in Alaska is at present confined to vegetable gardens scattered throughout the Territory as far north as Coldfoot, above the Arctic Circle; to small patches of hardy cereals, grown mainly at United States experiment stations; to the pasturing of wild grass and the harvesting of it for winter feed.

Practically all the hardy vegetables are grown, success varying with the length and character of the summer seasons. Potatoes have done well as far north as the Arctic Circle.

While vegetables are grown largely for private use, small market gardens are found in various places.

The Department of Agriculture has experiment stations at Sitka, Kenai, on the east shore of Cook Inlet, Copper Center, on the Copper River, 105 miles from Valdez, and at Rampart, on the Yukon.

That part of Alaska possessing agricultural possibilities may be divided into two general regions:

1. The southern coast region, lying between the ocean and the coast ranges of mountains, and including numerous islands; and

2. The river valleys between the coast ranges of mountains on the south and the Yukon Valley on the north.

To these regions may be added the Seward Peninsula, separated from Siberia by Bering Strait, and the great plateau extending north from the Arctic Circle to the Arctic Ocean. Both these regions are barren and covered with tundra, and propably neither need be considered from an agricultural standpoint, although, as stated, vegetables are raised in gardens as far north as Coldfoot, considerably above the Arctic Circle.

The coast region may be subdivided into southeastern and southwestern divisions.

Throughout the entire coast region experiments with grain have been almost wholly unsuccessful because of heavy rainfall and lack of dryness and sun heat necessary for maturing grains.

The coast region is rough and in nearly all places broken into small valleys. There are no extensive plains or valleys, unless a possible exception be the Yakutat Plains, near Yakutat Bay, about midway between Sitka and Valdez. Blue top, sedge, and beach rye are found here, but the area is limited and the soil boggy, requiring drainage for successful cultivation.

In the southeastern division of the coast region much of the land which might be arable is covered by timber, mainly spruce. Even where the timber has been cut the stumps remain a great length of time, and can only be removed and the ground otherwise prepared at great labor and cost.

Vegetables do well in this region. Experiments are being made with hardy fruits. Professor Georgeson expects that some hardy varieties, including apples, may succeed.

Wild currants and berries of high quality grow profusely throughout Alaska.

The soil, where it is at all arable, throughout the coast region is reported by Professor Georgeson to be somewhat sour, because, by reason of lack of heat, decomposition has been too slow and acids have formed. This difficulty is in some measure overcome by the use of lime as fertilizer.

The southwestern division of the coast region, known as the "treeless region" and extending westward from Prince William Sound, will be mainly valuable for grazing. Wild grass of good quality is found along the coast and on the larger islands, principal among them Kodiak, lying just below Cook Inlet.

The most common grasses are blue top, beach rye, and sedge.

Sedge is found in a zone next the coast. Beyond this is a belt of beach rye, while blue top is most abundant on the hillsides.

Blue top, owing to its slender stems and thin leaves, cures readily, beach rye with more difficulty, and sedge very slowly.

In the coast region at least it seems practically impossible to preserve large amounts of winter feed by curing, and it is believed resort must be had to silos.

In the southwestern division of the coast region vegetables are easily raised. Grains do not ripen for the reasons stated.

The climate of the southern coast region is mild and moist, both conditions resulting from the Japan current. The average winter climate of Sitka, Juneau, and Seward, on the southern coast, has frequently been said to be milder and more equable than that of Washington. The snowfall is heavy.

INTERIOR ALASKA.

Interior Alaska, north of the coast range of mountains, available for agricultural purposes comprises five river valleys—the Sushitna, Copper, Tanana, Yukon, and Kuskokwim. The climate of interior Alaska is dry and cold. The summer temperature in the interior valleys is said to range from 70° to 80°. In winter the mercury has been known to fall as low as 70° below zero, but the average winter temperature is said to be from 10° to 35° below zero. The general climate has been compared to that of Montana. Rain and snow fall is not heavy. The lack of moisture is complained of in connection with agricultural experiments, but lack of rain and snow is supplied in some degree by the moisture rising from the frozen earth always found underneath the surface.

The Sushitna River rises near Mount McKinley and flows almost directly south for something over 200 miles into the head of Cook Inlet.

The valley proper is said to have an altitude of from 100 to 700 feet above sea level.

The Coast Range shuts off the moist atmosphere of the coast, and the climate is dry and cool.

The winters are long and cold, and the summers, with long arctic days, are short and hot.

Vegetation matures rapidly in many hours of hot sun.

Seeding begins in May, and frosts may be expected in late August or early September.

Wild grass is abundant, growing to the height of 6 feet in some cases. Where it can be cut it yields commonly 2 or 3 tons to the acre, and frequently more.

Owing to the dry, clear atmosphere, grass is cured with comparative ease.

Except in unusually short seasons hardy grains mature easily and produce well. Oats, wheat, rye, and barley have been subjects of successful experiment. Mr. Ballaine, of Seward, believes Russian Club wheat to be particularly adapted to the climate of interior Alaska.

Vegetables are easily grown.

It has been estimated that the possible agricultural area of the Sushitna Valley is 10,000 square miles.

The Copper River Valley lies perhaps 150 miles east of the Sushitna Valley. Its altitude is somewhat greater than the Sushitna, and its climate is somewhat colder. Otherwise conditions are much the same as in the Sushitna Valley.

Grains have frequently been matured at the experiment station at Copper Center. Vegetables are regularly raised.

In this valley the land rises in broad terraces from the river bottom.

Professor Georgeson estimates the possible agricultural area at 15,000 square miles.

The Tanana Valley follows the river of the same name, which flows in a northwesterly direction from near the headwaters of the Copper River into the Yukon at the one hundred and fifty-seventh meridian, and is estimated to have a possible agricultural area of 15,000 square miles.

Climatic conditions are similar to those in interior valleys heretofore named.

Portions of the Yukon Valley are available for agricultural and grazing purposes practically throughout its entire length in American territory.

The possible agricultural area of the Yukon Valley is estimated at 30,000 square miles. Conditions are much the same as in the Sushitna, Copper, and Tanana valleys.

The Kuskokwim Valley, less explored than the other valleys, follows the river of that name, which rises near Mount McKinley and flows in a general southwesterly direction into Bering Sea north of Bristol Bay.

Climatic conditions are similar to those in other inland valleys. The possible agricultural area of the valley is estimated to be 15,000 square miles.

Professor Georgeson has estimated that about 85,000 square miles in interior Alaska may be devoted to agriculture and grazing.

SUMMARY.

On February 27, 1906, Professor Georgeson appeared before the Committee on Territories, and in the course of his remarks, in reply to a question as to how the land and climate of Alaska compared with the land and climate of nations of Europe in about the same latitude as that of Alaska, made a comparison between Alaska and Finland.

Finland lies between the sixtieth and seventieth parallels, as does the main body of Alaska, with southeastern and southwestern Alaska lying south of the sixtieth parallel.

Climatic conditions are practically the same.

Finland has an area of about 148,000 square miles, or about one-fourth that of Alaska.

One-third of the area of Finland is forest, one-third lakes and marshes, and the remaining third, about 50,000 square miles, supports a population of about 3,000,000, only about one-tenth of whom live in towns and engage in occupations other than agriculture.

From Professor Georgeson's estimate of the possible agricultural area of Alaska it will be seen that there is no reason why Alaska should not support an agricultural population at least equal to that of Finland, which is maintained on barely more than half the agricultural area of Alaska.

It is not contended that agricultural developments will be rapid, but that the high prices paid for agricultural products in Alaska and liberal homestead laws will gradually attract a population of hardy settlers.

At present the population furnishing a market for agricultural products is limited to those engaged in placer mining.

The construction of railroads will not only result in the extension of placer mining, but permit the bringing in of machinery for quartz mining, stamping and smelting of gold, and will open extensive copper and gold properties, which for lack of adequate transportation can not be developed.

The development of these enterprises, which can only come with trunk lines of railroad, will necessarily result in greatly increased population, affording a proportionately larger home market for agricultural products, and the gradual establishment of stable agricultural communities.

COMMUNICATION AND TRANSPORTATION.

MAIL SERVICE.

Eighty-seven mail routes are reported to be in operation in Alaska, covering 26,247 miles.

Mail is carried by contract, in some cases at a certain rate per pound, in others for a fixed amount per round trip, and in others at a fixed amount for a given period.

Trips vary in frequency, with the geography of the Territory, from seven trips a week to two round trips during the winter in each year.

TELEGRAPH.

The only telegraph system in Alaska consists of the Government cables and land lines.

The cable system extends from Seattle to Sitka, Valdez, and Seward, with a branch line from Sitka to Juneau, Haines Mission, and Skagway, a total distance of 2,333 miles. The estimated cost of the cables is $1,121,900, or $481 a mile.

The land lines, 1,405 miles in extent, connect with the cable system at Valdez, run to Eagle, thence across through Fairbanks, and down the Yukon to St. Michael.

The estimated cost of the land lines is $867,500, or $617 a mile, the comparative high cost of land lines being largely due to the cost of transportation.

St. Michael and Safety Bay, near Nome, are connected through a distance of 107 miles by wireless service, the two stations for which cost $32,000. Safety Bay and Nome are connected by a short land line.

TELEPHONE.

Short telephone lines are reported in various parts of Alaska.

It was stated before the Committee on Territories that one company was operating about 700 miles of telephone line in Seward Peninsula.

TRANSPORTATION.

In a general way it may be said that there are three routes of travel and transportation into Alaska.

First, by sea to Skagway; thence by the White Pass and Yukon Railroad to the head of navigation on the Lewes River, a tributary of the Yukon, and thence down the Lewes and Yukon Rivers to such points as can be reached on the latter and its tributaries. By this route the distance from Skagway to Fairbanks is about 1,500 miles.

The second route is by the Pacific Ocean, Bering Sea, and the Yukon River. The distance from St. Michael at the mouth of the Yukon River to Fairbanks is something over 1,000 miles.

These two routes are available during the summer months only. The ice goes out of the Yukon so that boats can go down the river about June 1, and navigation on the river closes about October 1.

The ice in St. Michael's Bay prevents entrance to the mouth of the Yukon River until about July 1, and navigation continues until about the middle of September.

The third route is inland by trail from Valdez. The trail runs northwest to Copper Center; above that point one branch follows the military telegraph line to Eagle City, and the other branch strikes north across country to the Tanana and Fairbanks.

Freight can only be taken over this route in winter. Travel in summer must be by horse or on foot.

Maj. W. P. Richardson, of the Army, states that even with good wagon roads it is "hardly possible to bring the cost (of transportation) below $2 per ton mile, and it ranges from that to $8 or $10 per ton mile, a price prohibitive except for short distances."

Freight rates by water into such points in the interior as are on navigable water are said to average about $100 a ton.

One witness before the Committee on the Territories, Mr. A. Spring, of Fairbanks, president of the Tanana Electric Company, stated that on his return to Fairbanks he would take with him certain electric motors to be used in connection with the pumping operations of his plant, and that he would have to pay freight charges of 50 cents a pound, or $1,000 per ton.

At Tanana Crossing, 300 miles from the Pacific Ocean and 200 miles from the Yukon, flour, salt, and sugar were quoted at 75 cents a pound, and in the winter horse feed ranges from 7½ to 25 cents a pound, or from $150 to $500 a ton. This cost is fixed wholly by high transportation charges.

WAGON ROADS AND TRAILS.

Under existing law all money collected from licenses, which are in the nature of occupation taxes, outside of incorporated towns, is set apart for what is known as the "Alaska fund."

Seventy per cent of this fund is expended by the board of road commissioners for the improvement of roads and trails, but the fund has been too small to permit extensive improvements.

The Senate added to the military appropriation bill an item of $150,000 to be applied to this work.

The Secretary of War proposed to recommend and urge an appropriation of $1,000,000 for road and trail improvement in Alaska, but stated that in case Congress concluded to extend aid in the construction of railroads this appropriation for road and trail work might properly be withheld.

The work of the Government in surveying and establishing roads and trails not only confers immediate benefit in improved shipping facilities, but is of large indirect benefit in possible railroad construction by determining at Government expense the most feasible routes for railroads, and in ascertaining and reporting the conditions to be encountered along various routes.

RAILROADS.

The primary interest of the Federal Government in connection with railroads in Alaska should be to extend such aid as will secure the construction of certain trunk lines connecting the Yukon River and intermediate interior points with ports on the Pacific Ocean, which are open to navigation throughout the year.

Two natural routes from points on the Gulf of Alaska commend themselves both because of the excellence of the harbors at their ocean termini, and because of the physical advantages along the line of the routes.

One of these routes is by the valley of the Sushitna River, which extends northward from the head of Cook Inlet and furnishes comparatively easy grades through the mountain ranges and for the greater part of the distance from the ocean to Fairbanks on the Tanana and to the Yukon River. As heretofore indicated, a liberal coal supply of high quality is conveniently at hand in the Matanuska Valley.

The other of these routes is from some point on Prince William Sound or adjacent waters up the valley of the Copper River, thence northeast to the Yukon River near Eagle City, or northwest up the Tanana Valley to Fairbanks and the Yukon.

Railroads extending from the Gulf of Alaska by these routes, supplemented by a line from the vicinity of Fairbanks westward to Seward Peninsula and Nome, would solve the problem of transportation in Alaska. Branch lines would quickly meet local needs, and in time the whole of Alaska would be given quick and ample transportation during the entire year.

Progress in railroad construction in Alaska is indicated in a memorandum submitted to the Secretary of War by Maj. W. P. Richardson, of the Ninth Infantry, and president of the board of road commissioners of Alaska.

The memorandum is as follows:

The railroad mileage in Alaska at present embraces the following:

1. A section 20 miles in length of the White Pass and Yukon route, from Skagway to the summit of White Pass, which is continued in Canadian territory to White Horse, and there connects with river navigation in summer and stage in winter for Dawson. No extensions of this road have been made since the summer of 1901.

2. At Valdez, preliminary work only, upon a proposed road from that point to the copper properties south of the Wrangell group of mountains, with possible extension to similar deposits reported on the Nebesna branch of the upper Tanana.

3. At Seward, Resurrection Bay, the Alaska Central Railroad (building), which reported late last season a probable completion of 50 miles by the end of 1905. This road, I understand, is heading for some point on the Tanana.

4. Tanana Mines Railway, 26 miles, constructed last season, connecting Fairbanks with Chena, on the Tanana River, and creeks in the vicinity.

5. On the Seward Peninsula (Nome district) the Nome-Arctic Railway, extending from the town of Nome something over 20 miles into the peninsula northward toward the head of Nome River and the Kongorok district.

6. The Solomon River road, from the mouth of Solomon River (35 miles east of Nome) up the said river and toward Council City, the proposed terminus, 17 miles of which are now completed.

7. The Council City and Ophir Creek road, from Council to mining claim No. 15, Ophir, about 8 miles.

Of these various roads, the Alaska Central and the Solomon River roads are standard, the others narrow gauge. The roads in the Nome district operate at present only during the summer season. The White Pass and Yukon is operated continuously, and is in excellent condition for all kinds of traffic.

These different sections of roads are enumerated to show the progress of railroad construction up to date in Alaska. It has been demonstrated that the cost of construction is not abnormally large and that roads can be operated the year round.

With the exception of the White Pass and Yukon route, which serves mostly Canadian territory, the railroads so far constructed have been of little, or only local, benefit in the development of the region, partly through lack of information and absence of defined plan in the minds of promoters, and in some cases through a conflict of effort to secure concessions or aid from the Government, by which investors would be assured a return upon their capital stock.

Of such of these roads as are in operation or actual construction, only the Alaska Central gives promise of being such a trunk line as would warrant Government aid on the theory of the general good of Alaska and of the United States.

Reference is made to a proposed road from Valdez. This road is doubtless one of a group of roads proposing, or stating that they propose, to construct trunk lines from the vicinity of Valdez, Orca, or Martin Island up the Copper River Valley to the Yukon.

Up to this time five companies, seeking to utilize the Copper River Valley route, have been organized under the laws of various States of the Union, and are availing themselves of the meager advantages offered by the general law relating to the construction of railroads in Alaska, approved May 14, 1898.

The following analysis indicates what grants are made to railroads under this law and what steps railroad companies must take to secure the benefits offered by the act.

By the general law, act of May 14, 1898, companies building railroads in Alaska are granted:

1. Right of way 100 feet each side of center of road.

2. Right to take from adjacent public lands earth, stone, and timber for construction purposes.

3. Right to take 60 acres for terminals and 20 acres each 10 miles for stations, side tracks, etc.

4. Right to use such additional ground as in opinion of the Secretary of the Interior may be necessary in case of heavy cuts or fills.

5. Minerals in right of way and other lands are reserved from grant.

To take advantage of the act companies must—

1. File copy of articles of incorporation and proofs of organization with Secretary of the Interior.

2. File "preliminary actual survey" with Secretary of the Interior. (Such preliminary survey gives right to file "map and profile of definite location" within one year, and during that year the lands covered by preliminary survey are subject to the right of way.)

3. File, within one year of date of filing preliminary survey, map and profile of definite location of at least one 20-mile section.

4. File thereafter each year map of definite location of at least one additional 20-mile section.

5. Uncompleted sections of road will be forfeited—

(a) If any section be not completed within one year after filing map of definite location.

(b) If map of definite location be not filed within one year as above required.

(c) If the entire road is not completed within four years after filing map of definite location.

The extent to which these companies, which for convenience may be called the Copper River companies, have proceeded under the general law is indicated by the following statement, based on information furnished by the Secretary of the Interior:

STATUS OF COPPER RIVER VALLEY ROADS.

1. Valdez, Marshall Pass and Northern:

Proposed from Valdez to Eagle City, 413 miles.

Incorporated under laws of New Jersey.

Articles of incorporation accepted by Interior Department June 9, 1905.

Preliminary survey for 25.78 miles from Valdez to Marshall Pass filed May 6, 1905.

Stated that map of definite location filed in land office at Juneau.

2. Copper River Railway Company:

Proposed from mouth of Copper River to Fairbanks, with privilege of continuing to the Yukon.

Incorporated under laws of Washington.

Articles of incorporation accepted March 14, 1906.

Preliminary survey from point on Copper River at mouth of Kotsina River south to Eyak Point, Orca Inlet, accepted for filing April 11, 1906.

3. Copper River and Northwestern Railway Company:

Proposed from Valdez to Eagle City, with privilege of continuing to the Koyukuk.

Incorporated under laws of Nevada.

Articles of incorporation accepted July 18, 1905.

Map of definite location for 20 miles from Valdez through Keystone Canyon accepted for filing January 17, 1906.

Preliminary survey from Keystone Canyon to Ptarmigan Drop accepted April 9, 1906.

Preliminary survey from Hayden Canyon to Copper River accepted January 31, 1906.

Three plats for station and terminal grounds filed and approved.

4. Alaska Pacific Railway and Terminal Company:

Proposed from Martin Island, in Controller Bay, to Eagle City, 450 miles.

Incorporated under laws of Washington.

Articles of incorporation accepted April 6, 1906.

Preliminary surveys covering 117 miles north from Martin Island have been filed, but no action has yet been taken upon maps.

Three plats of definite location of station and junction grounds have been filed, but no action has been taken.

5. Akron, Sterling and Northern Railroad Company:

Proposed from Valdez to Eagle City.

Articles of incorporation and preliminary survey from Valdez to Eagle City and map of definite location 20 miles northward from Valdez, filed in 1903, but rights so obtained have been relinquished.

Probably the only railroad now on a profitable commercial basis in Alaska is the White Pass and Yukon road, extending from Skagway, at the head of Lynn Canal, 20 miles in American and 92 miles in Canadian territory to White Horse, at the head of navigation on the Lewes River, a large tributary of the Yukon.

This road, owned by English capital, of course controls traffic seeking entrance to Alaska by the upper Yukon route and serves the Yukon River country often as far west as Rampart and Fairbanks.

The Canadian government has always given liberal aid to railroad construction.

At present a road being built from Dawson, 84 miles, to Stewart River, in British Yukon territory, is receiving a cash subsidy of $6,400 a mile. Gentlemen connected with the road state that the company has been assured that if it would extend its line southward to connect with the Canadian Pacific, or with the proposed Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian government would guarantee the interest on its construction bonds to the extent of $30,000 per mile.

Aside from aid from the Dominion government, the province of British Columbia is offering liberal land grants in aid of railroad construction.

The evident policy of the Canadian government is to secure an "all Canadian" route to the Yukon, and in pursuance of this policy Canada is assisting the Grand Trunk Pacific Company in the construction of 3,600 miles of road from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Approximately the eastern half of the road is being guilt by the government, to be leased to the company on the basis of 3 per cent of the cost of construction. In the prairie section of the western half of the road the government will guarantee the company's bonds to the extent of $12,000 per mile, and in the mountain section of the western half the government will guarantee the company's bonds to the extent of three-fourths of the cost of construction.

The western terminus of this line is Port Simpson, just below the southern end of Alaska and nearer Alaska by almost 500 miles than any port in the United States.

THE ALASKA RAILROAD COMPANY.

It is intended that the road, the building of which the pending bill seeks to encourage, shall start at the head of Cordova Bay, on Prince William Sound, run south and east to the Copper River, which it is to cross at the head of the delta just below Childs Glacier. From this point a branch is to run southeast about 50 miles to the Bering River coal fields. The main line again crosses the Copper River about 3 miles above the first bridge and follows the river on its west bank to a point above Copper Center, where it leaves the river and in a general way follows the line of the military telegraph to Eagle City; in all, a distance of about 525 miles.

No surveys have been officially filed with the Interior Department, because there is no corporate entity to make the filing, the incorporation of certain persons being one of the objects of the pending bill.

However, a reconnoissance has been made covering practically the entire route. Its feasibility has been determined, and its cost estimated at from $30,000 to $40,000 per mile, or about $20,000,000 for the entire road.

The financial standing of the proposed incorporators is sufficient guaranty of their ability to finance the road.

Such objections as are publicly made to the pending bill may all be reduced to the complaint that it conflicts with the rights of other companies which have gone ahead in good faith under existing law.

First, it can not be claimed that the proposed charter conflicts with other companies in their rights of way. The exact provisions of the general law as to the location of rights of way are followed. This charter confers no special privilege in that respect.

Even if the bill sought, which it does not, to deprive any other company of rights which it has acquired under existing law, it could not legally do so.

Mr. C. Z. Gordon, representing the Alaska Pacific Railway and Terminal Company, stated before the Committee on Territories that, in his opinion as a lawyer, the bill could not deprive his company of any legal rights.

Dr. M. W. Bruner, agent and promoter of the same company, referring to the bill, stated that he "would be glad to see these gentlemen get any aid they are asking. The pending bill will not reach our own case, and we do not expect to avail ourselves of its beneficence."

On the question of any possible advantage which the road seeking incorporation by this bill might acquire over any other road, ex-Senator George Turner, representing the Alaska Central Railroad Company, said:

> I can see no advantage that would accrue to a company incorporated by Congress over that of a company incorporated by one of the States.

The representatives of the gentlemen seeking incorporation by this bill state frankly that they hope to raise money more readily under a Federal charter, which is evidence of the interest of the Government in railroads in Alaska.

Objection is made on the ground that this bill grants a right to obtain land which is not granted to other roads proceeding under the general law.

If it is wrong to grant a charter and if it is wrong to grant land and if it is inadvisable to extend the Government credit, then there is no proper aid for railroads in Alaska, and they may as well be allowed to shift for themselves under the provisions of the general law which grants no encouragement which has been sufficient so far to cause to be built any railroad of commercial value in Alaska.

Land grants in aid of railroads have seldom, if ever, been made otherwise than by special act. They can not well be made by general law, because until the request for the grant is made and its location indicated neither the necessity for it nor the wisdom of it can be determined.

The Committee on the Territories did not feel justified in reporting a bill to extend the credit of the Government by guaranty of interest on railroad bonds.

The gentlemen interested in the pending bill expressed the belief that with the small grant of terminal lands, the right to purchase town-site land, and the Federal charter they could build a trunk line of railroad, and the lands purchased are forfeited if they do not build such a line.

The bill grants to the company a right of way 200 feet wide, with 20 acres each 10 miles for stations. The provision of the general law is the same. The bill grants 160 acres for terminals, instead of 60 granted by the general law.

The bill gives to the company the right to buy 2,560 acres of land on Cordova Bay for a town site, which tract shall be in compact form with a water frontage not exceeding 2 miles. A harbor area 800 feet wide across the entire water front is reserved to the public forever.

The bill grants the proposed company the right to buy 640 acres of coal land at the Government price of $10 per acre.

This is giving the company no special privilege as to coal land, compared with a bill which recently passed the House proposing to give any individual the right to enter upon 1,280 acres at that price. This bill merely enables the company to obtain full title at once.

Representatives of some companies have urged that the people seeking this charter and land grant should be content with the advantages offered by the general law in respect to the construction of railroads in Alaska.

The inefficiency of the general law in the securing of trunk lines of road in Alaska is shown by the fact that of at least seven companies, organized under the laws of various States and proceeding under the general law which has been in operation for eight years, only two have built any road, and both of these asserted before the Committee on the Territories that they were sorely in need of aid and doubted their ability to proceed without it. Both are now curtailing their operations.

The other five companies have done no more than file surveys, with the possible exception of one which is said to have done some grading out of Valdez.

The pending bill is the result of long and careful investigation and work upon the provisions of the bill by a subcommittee of the Committee on the Territories.

The bill as at first introduced was objected to by the Interior Department.

It was again amended, but in some particulars still met objection in the Department. It was again amended and has the approval of that Department. [Applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I fully concur in everything that has been said about the possibilities of Alaska and the necessity for railroad construction. I fully agree in all that is said with reference to the coal lands and copper industry and the necessity of having some means of transportation by which those products may reach a market. But I can not agree in the judgment of the committee as expressed by its chairman that because Alaska needs railroads that this particular railroad is to be favored by the United States Government. If you will carefully investigate this matter you will ascertain that there are now two roads projected practically over the same route that this proposes to travel. There are two roads now chartered under the laws of the States and each of them have done some work looking toward construction of their roads. I may be mistaken, but my judgment is that the only effect the passage of this bill is to make a choice amongst three roads and give an opportunity to one that is not afforded to the other two. The proposed road seeks through this bill to obtain a charter. The several roads that are now doing business in Alaska are not chartered by the United States. Their incorporation is effected under State law.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman tell me what the three roads are to which he refers?

Mr. LLOYD. The Alaska Central, which has been graphically described by my friend [Mr. HAMILTON], the Copper River road, and I do not know the name of the other road, but it is represented by some Pennsylvania people. I guess there is no question about the fact that there are two roads.

Mr. HAMILTON. You mean the Bruner road?

Mr. LLOYD. The Bruner road.

Mr. HAMILTON. I did not understand what the statement of the gentleman was in that connection. Will you kindly repeat it? I was listening to something else.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] asked me to state what were the three roads to which I referred. I said the Alaska Central was a chartered road, and I said there are two others that practically go over the same route that is proposed by this one, and one of those is the Copper River route and the other is the Bruner road.

Mr. HAMILTON. I do not agree with the gentleman in that they go over the same route.

Mr. LLOYD. I said practically. Of course, it is not exactly the same. In going through the difficult part of it, which is the defiles in the mountains, I suppose they will travel necessarily over the same route.

Mr. HAMILTON. I believe that is true.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is provided for in the bill.

Mr. LLOYD. That is provided for in the bill. But up to the present time, if the House will permit me to say, no railroad has been chartered by the Government to do business in Alaska, and what is sought to be done by this bill is to give this particular road a Government charter.

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON. Does not the gentleman think we might as well give a charter to these people, or that it would be as proper, at least, to give a charter to these people, as to give a Government guaranty of interest on construction bonds on railroads in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I will not reveal any secrets of the committee room when I say that the gentleman from Michigan and myself fully agree, or have thus far, on the question of Government aid to a railroad. Both of us are opposed to guaranteeing any interest on bonds.

Mr. HAMILTON. That is true.

Mr. LLOYD. And as far as the Philippine Islands are concerned, we both agree on the question of guaranteeing interest on bonds there; and I think we further agree that if the legislation that guaranteed interest on Philippine bonds had come from the Committee on Territories, we would have had considerable trouble in getting the bill out.

Mr. HAMILTON. I think you are right. The point I was making is this: We are seeking here in this bill to give a Government charter to a railroad, when we have a law that is applicable to Alaska that gives the right of way and terminal facilities, and gives every facility for the construction of a railroad. A company can be organized anywhere in the United States just as these other companies have been and transact a railroad business and build their railroad in Alaska.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Have any roads been built under companies that have organized under State incorporations?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes; the Alaska Central is incorporated and doing business under State laws.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. How much have they built?

Mr. LLOYD. They have built about 50 miles of road.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is practically all in Alaska, except the White Pass and Yukon?

Mr. LLOYD. There are five little roads, as I remember it, in Alaska. This road is the longest. That has been constructed a distance of between 40 and 50 miles, and there is the Solomon City road, and a little road out of Nome, and a little road out of Fairbanks.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. But none of them practically, except these you have mentioned, have done any constructing work.

Mr. LLOYD. I beg your pardon. The Solomon City road has 17 miles of road constructed and in operation. There is a little road of about 8 miles in length, if I remember, out of Nome.

Mr. HAMILTON. That is the Council City road.

Mr. LLOYD. There is also a little road out of Fairbanks to the coal banks, narrow-gauge road that is now doing business, about 18 miles in length.

Mr. HAMILTON. All of these roads are narrow-gauge roads, except the Alaska Central and the Solomon City road.

Mr. LLOYD. The Alaska Central road, the one that is intended to go from the Pacific Ocean to the Yukon, a distance of some 400 miles, is a standard-gauge road.

Mr. HAMILTON. I have figured up, and including the 20 miles of the White Pass and Yukon there are only 136 miles of railroad, all told, in Alaska, including that little short line out of Fairbanks.

Mr. LLOYD. I think that is true; yes, sir. Now——

Mr. YOUNG. Can the gentleman tell me how long it has been since we began building roads in Alaska?

Mr. LLOYD. Not very long—some five or six years, I think. The greater part of these roads have been constructed in that time. The White Pass has been completed and in operation a longer time than that, but I do not know exactly the date at which construction began. Of course, most of them are not yet completed.

Mr. YOUNG. So the total result of five or six or seven years of work has been 137 miles?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG. And none of them have reached the interior of the country?

Mr. LLOYD. No, sir. Now, at the present time there are three roads already incorporated under the laws of the States that are engaged in preliminary and permanent survey or in the construction of roads from the Pacific Ocean to the interior of that country. There are two general roads—one the Alaska Central, about which nobody complains, and so far as this bill is concerned is not before the House in any particular.

The Alaska Central has already spent over $2,500,000, according to the testimony, in its construction, and has 45 miles of standard-gauge road ready for use. There are two other roads projected, and have their preliminary surveys filed, up the Copper River, not running exactly as this proposed one does, but practically in effect over the same route, because these go from the Gulf of Alaska to the interior. The difference is this: The proposed road has done nothing; no survey, no expenditures, no nothing, except they come to Congress and ask at the hands of Congress a charter. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman, I know, wants to be accurate.

Mr. LLOYD. I want to say in this connection that for the chairman of this committee I have the highest personal regard.

Mr. HAMILTON. It is entirely reciprocated.

Mr. LLOYD. And I know he would make no statement that he did not believe was absolutely true.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a privileged report. I desire to present a conference report on the bill S. 88—the pure-food bill—and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 88) entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment.

Strike out all of said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That it shall be unlawful for any person to manufacture within any Territory or the District of Columbia any article of food or drug which is adulterated or misbranded, within the meaning of this act; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and for each offense shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not to exceed $500 or shall be sentenced to one year's imprisonment, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court, and for each subsequent offense and conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $1,000 or sentenced to one year's imprisonment, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

"SEC. 2. That the introduction into any State or Territory or the District of Columbia from any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or from any foreign country, or shipment to any foreign country of any article of food or drugs which is adulterated or misbranded, within the meaning of this act, is hereby prohibited; and any person who shall ship or deliver for shipment from any State or Territory or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or to a foreign country, or who shall receive in any State or Territory or the District of Columbia from any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or foreign country, and having so received, shall deliver, in original unbroken packages, for pay or otherwise, or offer to deliver to any other person, any such article so adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, or any person who shall sell or offer for sale in the District of Columbia or the Territories of the United States any such adulterated or misbranded foods or drugs, or export or offer to export the same to any foreign country, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and for such offense be fined not exceeding two hundred dollars for the first offense, and upon conviction for each subsequent offense not exceeding three hundred dollars or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court; Provided, That no article shall be deemed misbranded or adulterated within the provisions of this act when intended for export to any foreign country and prepared or packed according to the specifications or direction of the foreign purchaser when no substance is used in the preparation or packing thereof in conflict with the laws of the foreign country to which said article is intended to be shipped; but if said article shall be in fact sold or offered for sale for domestic use or consumption, then this proviso shall not exempt said article from the operation of any of the other provisions of this act.

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall make uniform rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this act, including the collection and examination of specimens of foods and drugs manufactured or offered for sale in the District of Columbia, or in any Territory of the United States, or which shall be offered for sale in unbroken packages in any State other than that in which they shall have been respectively manufactured or produced, or which shall be received from any foreign country, or intended for shipment to any foreign country, or which may be submitted for examination by the chief health, food, or drug officer of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or at any domestic or foreign port through which such product is offered for interstate commerce, or for export or import between the United States and any foreign port or country.

"SEC. 4. That the examinations of specimens of foods and drugs shall be made in the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture, or under the direction and supervision of such Bureau, for the purpose of determining from such examinations whether such articles are adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act; and if it shall appear from any such examination that any of such specimens is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, the Secretary of Agriculture shall cause notice thereof to be given to the party from whom such sample was obtained. Any party so notified shall be given an opportunity to be heard, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed as aforesaid, and if it appears that any of the provisions of this act have been violated by such party, then the Secretary of Agriculture shall at once certify the facts to the proper United States district attorney, with a copy of the results of the analysis or the examination of such article duly authenticated by the analyst or officer making such examination, under the oath of such officer. After judgment of the court, notice shall be given by publication in such manner as may be prescribed by the rules and regulations aforesaid.

"SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of each district attorney to whom the Secretary of Agriculture shall report any violation of this act, or to whom any health or food or drug officer or agent of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia shall present satisfactory evidence of any such violation, to cause appropriate proceedings to be commenced and prosecuted in the proper courts of the United States, without delay, for the enforcement of the penalties as in such case herein provided.

"SEC. 6. That the term 'drug,' as used in this act, shall include all medicines and preparations recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary for internal or external use, and any substance or mixture of substances intended to be used for the cure, mitigation, or prevention of disease of either man or other animals. The term 'food,' as used herein, shall include all articles used for food, drink, confectionery, or condiment by man or other animals, whether simple, mixed, or compound.

"SEC. 7. That for the purposes of this act an article shall be deemed to be adulterated—

"In case of drugs:

"First. If, when a drug is sold under or by a name recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary, it differs from the standard of strength, quality, or purity, as determined by the test laid down in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary official at the time of investigation: Provided, That no drug defined in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary shall be deemed to be adulterated under this provision if the standard of strength, quality, or purity be plainly stated upon the bottle, box, or other container thereof, although the standard may differ from that determined by the test laid down in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary.

"Second. If its strength or purity fall below the professed standard or quality under which it is sold.

"In the case of confectionery:

"If it contains terra alba, barytes, talc, chrome yellow, or other mineral substance or poisonous color or flavor, or other ingredient deleterious or detrimental to health, or any vinous, malt, or spirituous liquor or compound or narcotic drug.

"In the case of food:

"First. If any substance has been mixed and packed with it so as to reduce or lower or injuriously affect its quality or strength.

"Second. If any substance has been substituted wholly or in part for the article.

"Third. If any valuable constituent of the article has been wholly or in part abstracted.

"Fourth. If it be mixed, colored, powdered, coated, or stained in a manner whereby damage or inferiority is concealed.

"Fifth. If it contain any added poisonous or other added deleterious ingredient which may render such article injurious to health: Provided, That when in the preparation of food products for shipment they are preserved by an external application applied in such manner that the preservative is necessarily removed mechanically, or by maceration in water, or otherwise, and directions for the removal of said preservative shall be printed on the covering or the package, the provisions of this act shall be contrued as applying only when said products are ready for consumption.

"Sixth. If it consists in whole or in part of a filthy, decomposed, or putrid animal or vegetable substance, or any portion of an animal unfit for food, whether manufactured or not, or if it is the product of a diseased animal, or one that has died otherwise than by slaughter.

"SEC. 8. That the term 'misbranded,' as used herein, shall apply to all drugs, or articles of food, or articles which enter into the composition of food, the package or label of which shall bear any statement, design, or device regarding such article, or the ingredients or substances contained therein which shall be false or misleading in any particular, and to any food or drug product which is falsely branded as to the State, Territory, or country in which it is manufactured or produced.

"That for the purposes of this act an article shall also be deemed to be misbranded:

"In case of drugs:

"First. If it be an imitation of or offered for sale under the name of another article.

"Second. If the contents of the package as originally put up shall have been removed, in whole or in part, and other contents shall have been placed in such package, or if the package fail to bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of any alcohol, morphine, opium, cocaine, heroin, alpha or beta eucaine, chloroform, cannabis indica, chloral hydrate, or acetanilide, or any derivative or preparation of any such substances contained therein.

"In the case of food:

"First. If it be an imitation of or offered for sale under the distinctive name of another article.

"Second. If it be labeled or branded so as to deceive or mislead the purchaser, or purport to be a foreign product when not so, or if the contents of the package as originally put up shall have been removed in whole or in part and other contents shall have been placed in such package, or if it fail to bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of any morphine, opium, cocaine, heroin, alpha or beta eucaine, chloroform, cannabis indica, chloral hydrate, or acetanilid, or any derivative or preparation of any of such substances contained therein.

"Third. If in package form, and the contents are stated in terms of weight or measure, they are not plainly and correctly stated on the outside of the package.

"Fourth. If the package containing it or its label shall bear any statement, design, or device regarding the ingredients or the substances contained therein, which statement, design, or device shall be false or misleading in any particular: Provided, That an article of food which does not contain any added poisonous or deleterious ingredients shall not be deemed to be adulterated or misbranded in the following cases:

"First. In the case of mixtures or compounds which may be now or from time to time hereafter known as articles of food, under their own distinctive names, and not an imitation of or offered for sale under the distinctive name of another article, if the name be accompanied on the same label or brand with a statement of the place where said article has been manufactured or produced.

"Second. In the case of articles labeled, branded, or tagged so as to plainly indicate that they are compounds, imitations, or blends, and the word 'compound,' 'limitation,' or 'blend,' as the case may be, is plainly stated on the package in which it is offered for sale: Provided, That the term 'blend' as used herein shall be construed to mean a mixture of like substances, not excluding harmless coloring or flavoring ingredients used for the purpose of coloring and flavoring only: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as requiring or compelling proprietors or manufacturers of proprietary foods which contain no unwholesome added ingredient to disclose their trade formulas, except in so far as the provisions of this act may require to secure freedom from adulteration or misbranding.

"SEC. 9. That no dealer shall be prosecuted under the provisions of this act when he can establish a guaranty signed by the wholesaler, jobber, manufacturer, or other party residing in the United States, from whom he purchases such articles, to the effect that the same is not adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, designating it. Said guaranty, to afford protection, shall contain the name and address of the party or parties making the sale of such articles to such dealer, and in such case said party or parties shall be amenable to the prosecutions, fines, and other penalties which would attach, in due course, to the dealer under the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 10. That any article of food, drug, or liquor that is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, and is being transported from one State, Territory, District, or insular possession to another for sale, or, having been transported, remains unloaded, unsold, or in original unbroken packages, or if it be sold or offered for sale in the District of Columbia or the Territories, or insular possessions of the United States, or if it be imported from a foreign country for sale, or if it is intended for export to a foreign country, shall be liable to be proceeded against in any district court of the United States within the district where the same is found, and seized for confiscation by a process of libel for condemnation. And if such article is condemned as being adulterated or misbranded, or of a poisonous or deleterious character, within the meaning of this act, the same shall be disposed of by destruction or sale, as the said court may direct, and the proceeds thereof, if sold, less the legal costs and charges, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, but such goods shall not be sold in any jurisdiction contrary to the provisions of this act or the laws of that jurisdiction: Provided, however, That upon the payment of the costs of such libel proceedings and the execution and delivery of a good and sufficient bond to the effect that such articles shall not be sold or otherwise disposed of contrary to the provisions of this act, or the laws of any State, Territory, District, or insular possession, the court may by order direct that such articles be delivered to the owner thereof. The proceedings of such libel cases shall conform, as near as may be, to the proceedings in admiralty, except that either party may demand trial by jury of any issue of fact joined in any such case, and all such proceedings shall be at the suit of and in the name of the United States.

"SEC. 11. The Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver to the Secretary of Agriculture, upon his request from time to time, samples of foods and drugs which are being imported into the United States or offered for import, giving notice thereof to the owner or consignee, who may appear before the Secretary of Agriculture, and have the right to introduce testimony, and if it appear from the examination of such samples that any article of food or drug offered to be imported into the United States is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, or is otherwise dangerous to the health of the people of the United States, or is of a kind forbidden entry into, or forbidden to be sold or restricted in sale in the country in which it is made or from which it is exported, or is otherwise falsely labeled in any respect, the said article shall be refused admission, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall refuse delivery to the consignee and shall cause the destruction of any goods refused delivery which shall not be exported by the consignee within three months from the date of notice of such refusal under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may deliver to the consignee such goods pending examination and decision in the matter on execution of a penal bond for the amount of the full invoice value of such goods, together with the duty thereon, and on refusal to return such goods for any cause to the custody of the Secretary of the Treasury, when demanded, for the purpose of excluding them from the country, or for any other purpose, said consignee shall forfeit the full amount of the bond: And provided further, That all charges for storage, cartage, and labor on goods which are refused admission or delivery shall be paid by the owner or consignee, and in default of such payment shall constitute a lien against any future importation made by such owner or consignee.

"SEC. 12. That the term 'territory' as used in this act shall include the insular possessions of the United States. The word 'person' as used in this act shall be construed to import both the plural and the singular, as the case demands, and shall include corporations, companies, societies, and associations. When construing and enforcing the provisions of this act, the act, omission, or failure of any officer, agent, or other person acting for or employed by any corporation, company, society, or association, within the scope of his employment or office, shall in every case be also deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such corporation, company, society, or association as well as that of the person.

"SEC. 13. That this act shall be in force and effect from and after the first day of January, nineteen hundred and seven."

That the House recede from its amendment to the title and agree to the title as passed in the Senate.

W. P. HEPBURN,
JAMES R. MANN,
W. H. RYAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

W. B. HEYBURN,
P. J. MCCUMBER,
A. C. LATIMER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT OF MANAGERS ON PART OF THE HOUSE.

The conferees on the part of the House on the bill (S. 88) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes, submit the following statement:

The House struck out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause and inserted in lieu thereof, as one amendment, an act complete in itself. There was, therefore, but one amendment as a whole to be considered by the conferees. The conferees accepted the House amendment as a basis and modified the same as herein explained by striking out all of the House amendment and inserting in lieu thereof the same matter as amended in conference.

The following statement is in explanation of the bill as reported by the conferees:

Section 1 is substantially section 1 of the Senate bill and prohibits manufacture of adulterated and misbranded foods and drugs within the Territories or District of Columbia.

Section 2 is substantially section 2 of the Senate bill and section 1 of the House amendment.

Section 3 is substantially section 3 of the Senate bill and section 2 of the House amendment.

Section 4 is substantially section 4 of the Senate bill and section 3 of the House amendment.

Section 5 is substantially section 5 of the Senate bill and section 4 of the House amendment.

Section 6 is substantially sections 6, 7, and 8 of the Senate bill combined and section 5 of the House amendment.

Section 7 is the one defining adulterations and contains the provisions of the House amendment and the Senate bill on the same matter in somewhat different arrangement. This section deals with adulterations. The conferees struck out the provision in the House amendment giving the definitions of adulterations of drugs and adopted the definitions in section 9 of the Senate bill. The remainder of the section is the same as the remainder of section 6 of the House amendment, which is substantially the same as provisions in the Senate bill in section 9, except that in the fifth subdivision in section 6 of the House amendment there is inserted after the word "otherwise," line 14, page 6, the following: "and directions for the removal of said preservative shall be printed on the covering or the package," so that said subdivision will read as follows:

"Fifth. If it contain any added poisonous or other added deleterious ingredient which may render such article injurious to health: Provided, That when in the preparation of food products for shipment they are preserved by an external application applied in such manner that the preservative is necessarily removed mechanically, or by maceration in water, or otherwise, and directions for the removal of said preservative shall be printed on the covering or the package, the provisions of this act shall be construed as applying only when said products are ready for consumption."

Section 8 is substantially the same as section 7 of the House amendment, with the following amendments:

Strike out of the first paragraph of the section numbered "Second" the following words at the end of the paragraph, to wit:

"Provided, however, That it may be proven as a complete defense to any accusation or prosecution for failure to state the quantity or proportion of alcohol as above required that the quantity or proportion of alcohol contained in any package does not exceed the quantity or proportion prescribed by the United States Pharmacopœia or the National Formulary as a solvent or preservative of the active necessary constituents of the medicine or preparation in such package."

And by amending the third paragraph, marked "Second," by inserting after the word "blends" the words "and the word 'compound,' 'imitation,' or 'blend,' as the case may be, is plainly stated on the package in which it is offered for sale," and inserting after the word "ingredient" the words "used for the purpose of coloring and flavoring only," so that said paragraph will read as follows:

"Second. In the case of articles labeled, branded, or tagged, so as to plainly indicate that they are compounds, imitations, or blends, and the word 'compound,' 'imitation,' or 'blend,' as the case may be, is plainly stated on the package in which it is offered for sale: Provided, That the term blend as used herein shall be construed to mean a mixture of like substances, not excluding harmless coloring or flavoring ingredients used for the purpose of coloring and flavoring only: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as requiring or compelling proprietors or manufacturers of proprietary foods which contain no unwholesome added ingredient to disclose their trade formulas, except in so far as the provisions of this act may require to secure freedom from adulteration or misbranding."

This section includes the provision requiring the labeling of habit-forming drugs by declaring any drug to be misbranded "if the package fail to bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of any alcohol, morphine, opium, cocaine, heroin, alpha or beta eucaine, chloroform, cannabis indica, chloral hydrate, or acetanilid, or any derivative or preparation of any such substances contained therein."

And the same requirement is made as to foods containing any of such narcotics.

Section 9 is the same as section 10 of the Senate bill and section 8 of the House amendment, and relates to the giving of a guaranty by the seller to the purchaser.

Section 10 is the same as section 13 of the Senate bill and section 13 of the House amendment.

Section 11 is the same as section 14 of the House amendment, for which there is no corresponding section in the Senate bill.

Section 12 is section 15 of the House amendment.

Section 13 declares that the act shall be in force and effect from and after the 1st day of January, 1907.

Omitted from the bill, as reported by the conferees, is section 9 of the House amendment relating to the fixing of standards of food. Also omitted is section 10 of the House amendment. Section 10 of the House amendment required any person to sell to a Government agent an article of food or drug which might be used against him in prosecution. Omitted is also section 11 of the House amendment providing for penalty for violation of the preceding section omitted, and providing for additional costs and expenses to be put against a defendant as part of the penalty. Omitted is also section 12 of the House amendment, providing that the articles complying with the provisions of the act shall not be interfered with by the several States so long as they remain in original unbroken packages.

W. P. HEPBURN,
JAMES R. MANN,
W. H. RYAN,
Managers on part of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in presenting the conference report on the pure-food bill I ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments in reference to the bill as agreed upon in conference.

I may say to the House that the bill as reported by the conferees is substantially the bill as passed by the House, with a few exceptions. We struck out in conference the section requiring the Secretary of Agriculture to determine the standards of food. We struck out in conference the section which required a man to sell articles of food which might be used against him in evidence, or made it a misdemeanor if he refused to sell—a provision which, in my judgment and in the judgment of most members both of the House and Senate, ought never to have been in any bill, and which was unconstitutional and might have made the whole bill unconstitutional. This provision was in both the Senate and House bills in identically the same language. The conferees thought that so far as the parliamentary situation was concerned they had authority to strike it out, it being part of the House amendment, and that upon its merits the provision ought to go out; and I think nobody here desires it to remain in.

We struck out the provision which affected the question of States' rights and the control of the Federal Government over original packages, leaving the law as it stands without regard to this bill.

We made a slight change in the amendment which affected the case of whisky, by specifically providing what we thought we had already covered—and still think we had covered—in the House bill—by specifically providing that in the case of compounded, imitation, and blended articles the package label shall bear the word "compound," "imitation," or "blend." And on the drug provision, while we accepted one definition of drugs that was in the Senate bill—which is not quite so strong as the House definition—we retained the important provision in regard to labeling on the package all the habit-forming drugs, as set forth in the House bill, and struck out the proviso excepting alcohol used as a solvent or preservative; so that as the bill is reported from the conferees it requires on all medicines the labeling of the quantity or proportion of alcohol, opium, morphine, and other habit-forming drugs which are named in the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I would think that I was somewhat derelict in my duty in reference to this bill if I did not say a word or two in regard to the services of the man in this House who is principally entitled to the credit for the enactment of a pure-food law at all. The chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce—and these words will come as a surprise and embarrassment to him—the gentleman from Iowa, Colonel HEPBURN, for eight years and more has been a determined, constant, steady advocate of pure-food legislation. Three times at least the House, under his lead, has passed a pure-food bill. And when it shall become enacted into law, as I believe this shortly will be when this conference report is agreed upon, to him the most credit for the law will be due. [Loud general applause.]

And I wish also to express my appreciation of the great services rendered in connection with the work on this bill by one of the ablest, most industrious, and most efficient Members of the House, the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I propose to take the House a little further into my confidence in reference to this matter before the final vote is had. For some weeks past we have been bombarded from all parts of the country with newspaper requests that the House cease urging the passage of its bill and agree upon the Senate pure-food bill. The source and inspiration of these demands is not known to many Members of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that in the conference report section 12 of the original bill is stricken out. Is that true?

Mr. MANN. It is stricken out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just a word. I am glad to hear that, for I was very anxious to vote for the bill, and now I am able to do so.

Mr. BURLESON. Coupled with that statement, I desire to say that there were others who voted against the bill because of section 12.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it was because we desired the vote of the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi that we struck it out, so that it may be unanimous in the House. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. POLLARD. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. POLLARD. I would like to ask the gentleman whether there was any change made in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole in regard to the labeling of food products?

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman refer to the labeling of the quantity of the contents?

Mr. POLLARD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. There was no change made in the conference from the amendment as adopted by the House.

Mr. POLLARD. I should like to ask another question.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. POLLARD. I believe the gentleman made the statement that the conference struck out the House provision that the Secretary of Agriculture should determine what the standards should be?

Mr. MANN. That section goes out entirely in the conference report.

Mr. POLLARD. Was there any change made in the provision of the House, wherein we provided that a board of five inspectors should be selected to pass upon the wholesomeness or deleteriousness of the foods?

Mr. MANN. That provision was in section 9, directing the Secretary of Agriculture to determine standards, and the entire section goes out.

Mr. POLLARD. If that is the case, who determines whether a preservative that is used is poisonous or deleterious to health?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, as I stated to the House when the bill was before the House, it is the courts which must determine in the end as to the question of the wholesomeness or the deleteriousness of preservatives or of any article of food. The only object in having that provision in the bill, requiring the Secretary of Agriculture to determine standards, was for the purpose of governing prosecutions and provide uniformity and give to producers in advance of prosecution knowledge of the requirements insisted upon by the officials in charge; but the Senate conferees were unalterably opposed to that provision, and as it was not an essential provision of the law we gave way on that provision in order to save the rest of the bill practically intact as the House had enacted it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. From such study as I have been able to give the bill it seems to me a good measure; but I should like to put to the gentleman one question in line with the question that was asked by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. POLLARD], and that is on the matter of the standards. In the report submitted by the Committee on Interstate Commerce on this bill I find this clause on page 4:

> It is, however, essential to the success and operation of any pure-food measure that standards of food products shall be arrived at, for the guidance of the officials charged with the administration of the law and often for the information of the courts.

And a little later it says:

> It is therefore provided in the bill that the Secretary of Agriculture—

And so forth. That report states that it is essential for the success and operation of any pure-food law to have standards established by the Secretary. Now, I presume that the conferees have reached a conclusion, in view of some provisions of the bill, that will justify a reversal of that opinion, and I should like to hear from the gentleman from Illinois on that subject.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, when the report on this bill in the House was written, I did say in the report that it was essential to the success of a pure-food bill. It is essential to the best success of a pure-food bill that the Secretary of Agriculture or some other official shall determine the standards; but the gentleman from Wisconsin certainly has enough understanding of language to know that nothing in the world is absolutely "essential" in legislation. We do not have the bill exactly as we wanted it, but, so far as the vital features of the bill are concerned, we have them contained in the bill as it comes back to the House. I may say to the House further that, under the law as it now stands in the agricultural appropriation bill, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to fix standards of foods; and while I do not believe that is sufficient legislation, and while for one I never would be willing to consent that the Secretary of Agriculture should have the arbitrary power to determine what is adulterated or misbranded food, I do think that the provision that the House committee brought into the House as section 9, as amended in the House at my suggestion, was, on the whole, the most perfect provision upon the subject of fixing standards which has ever been before the House, and the committee owe quite largely the perfection of that section to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]; and I regret exceedingly that we met a stone wall on that section of the bill in the determined opposition of the Senate conferees. The existing law, however, is entirely sufficient for the operation of the pure-food law.

Mr. LACEY. Can I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: The gentleman will recall that we accepted an amendment providing that this should not modify the Wilson law. Is that retained?

Mr. MANN. It is not retained. We struck out the whole of section 12. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] was to section 12, and was a modification of it, and the entire section went out, so that the law remains as it now is.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was about to say that we have been bombarded with requests to accept the Senate pure-food bill. I want to state to the House the reason why and to tell the House a confidence on my part, which it ought to know before it passes finally on the conference report.

When the Senate bill first came before the House it contained a provision that on packages containing food there should be placed on the label the quantity of alcohol and opium in them. That provision as it came to the House in the Senate bill only applied to food. While it may be well to require, as we now have, that any foods that have opium or narcotics in them shall state the quantity of opium and other narcotics, it was ridiculous to say that we should require the statement on food packages of the amount of liquor and opium and not require it on medicinal articles. When the bill came before the House committee I prepared a provision in the bill requiring that as to medicinal articles there should be placed on the package the amount of alcohol and of opium and other poisonous substances, and we ran at once against the powerful influence of the Proprietary Medicine Association, which has a greater control of the newspapers of the land than any other institution in our country, as far as affecting the financial end of the papers is concerned.

I did not care to have the House bombarded with requests at the instance of the patent-medicine advertisers asking that that provision might be stricken out, and I resorted to what might almost be called strategy.

The pure-food bill as it passed the Senate did not contain any provision requiring a statement of the amount of alcohol, opium, or other narcotic or habit-forming drugs. The Senate bill contained no restriction whatever. The House substitute for the Senate bill as reported back to the House contained a provision, which I had drawn without suggestion from anyone else and which was adopted by our committee, providing that any article of drug or medicine should be deemed misbranded "if it fail to bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of any alcohol therein, or of any opium, cocaine, or other poisonous substance which may be contained therein." Immediately after the bill was reported back to the House containing this provision, the manufacturers of proprietary medicines containing habit-forming drugs got busy. The officers of the proprietary association started at once for Washington. They insisted that the provision was absolutely new, had been adopted without any hearings, and would be ruinous to their business if enacted into law. Our subcommittee gave them courteous, full, and patient hearing. They presented to us an amendment to be substituted for the provision on the subject, which I have quoted. This substitute amendment was practically a copy of the Massachusetts statute upon the subject, and was as follows:

Or if it fail to bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of alcohol therein, where such quantity is in excess of the amount shown to be necessary by the United States Pharmacopœia or the National Formulary, as a solvent or preservative of the active constituents thereof and to prevent freezing and fermentation; or if it fail to bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of any opium, morphine, heroin, alpha or beta eucaine, or chloral hydrate contained therein, provided that the package contains more than 2 grains of opium or more than one-quarter grain of morphine or more than one-sixteenth grain of heroin or more than one-sixteenth grain of alpha or beta eucaine or more than 8 grains of chloral hydrate in 1 fluid ounce or, if a solid preparation, in 1 avoirdupois ounce, or if it fail to bear a statement on the label of the quantity of cocaine therein; but such statement shall not be required upon preparations made from coca leaves, where not over 2 ounces of such leaves are used to make each fluid pint of such preparation, and to which no alkaloid cocaine has been added.

We were also informed that if the provision which I had drawn remained in the bill it would result in the local druggists preparing practically all of the medicinal preparations now prepared and sold as proprietary or patent medicines. They said the proposition in the bill was distinctly in the interest of the local druggist as against the proprietary-medicine manufacturers. At the same time, through some kind of representations which they made to the druggists throughout the country, they were enabled to flood the committee with telegrams and letters from local druggists insisting that the provision in the bill would be a great detriment to the local druggists. The proprietary-medicine people informed us that the provision in the bill would benefit the local druggists, and they caused the local druggists to inform us that the same provision would ruin the local druggists. At the same time they gave out to the public and through various newspaper sources the statement that an amendment had been proposed to the House bill which would legalize the use of opium and other habit-forming drugs in patent medicines and urging that the Senate bill be adopted in the House.

Patent-medicine people, therefore, for the purpose of knocking the House bill, which contained my provision, and for the purpose of insisting upon the adoption of the Senate bill, which contained no provision relating to habit-forming drugs, caused to be circulated the statement that their own amendment had been proposed and was pending in the House.

Mr. Speaker, I could see looming up in front of me, as an almost insurmountable obstacle to the passage of the pure-food bill, the activity of the proprietary medicine people and their tremendous influence through their enormous newspaper advertising. I was unwilling to sacrifice the pure-food bill, even if it became necessary to yield somewhat to that influence. I prepared an amendment as a temporary palliative for the purpose of weakening and overcoming, if possible, the activity and opposition of the proprietary medicine people. That amendment was as follows, and provided that a medicine should be deemed misbranded—

If, when the article contained be not described in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary, and be not the prescription of a regularly licensed physician, the package fail to bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of any alcohol, morphine, opium, cocaine, heroin, alpha or beta eucaine, or chloral hydrate, or any preparation of any of such substances, contained therein: Provided, however, That the quantity or proportion of alcohol need not be stated when not more than the quantity or proportion prescribed by the United States Pharmacopœia or the National Formulary as a solvent or preservative of the active constituents of the medicine or preparation in such package is used: And provided further, That the quantity or proportion of opium or morphine need not be stated when the contents of the package contain not more than 2 grains of opium or one-quarter grain of morphine to the fluid ounce, or if a solid preparation, to the avoirdupoise ounce.

It was intended as a substitute for the provision already in the House bill on the subject. This amendment was agreed to by our committee, was given out to the public, was satisfactory to the larger proportion of the proprietary medicine people, though not satisfactory to those using cocaine and some other habit-forming drugs. But I had canvassed the eighteen members of our Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and knew how each one stood on the proposition. I knew that a considerable majority of that committee were in favor of absolutely requiring the statement of the amount of the habit-forming drugs on every medicine, without regard to the amount, and I knew that a majority of the committee were ready and willing at any time, at the request of Colonel HEPBURN and myself, the persons in charge of the bill, to agree to the amendment which was afterwards agreed to and is now in the bill.

Mr. Speaker, it so happens that my committee room is close to the press gallery in the House. It so happens that a number of the newspaper correspondents make frequent use of a typewriting machine in my room. This has been done with my free consent and invitation, and I am glad to extend to them that courtesy. It so happened during the progress of the fight over this drug amendment that one day I was in consultation in my committee room with Samuel Hopkins Adams, of Collier's Weekly, who has done so much good in the fight against these narcotic or habit-forming drugs, and that on that day the staff correspondent of the Chicago Daily News was in my room making use of my typewriting machine. I talked with Mr. Adams for some time in a general way, and then said to him that his interest in the matter was so great that if I might speak to him in absolute confidence I would be glad to do so. I have always considered that when the newspaper correspondents were in the room they might freely overhear anything I said, because unless I gave them permission otherwise I felt confident that what I said would be treated in confidence, and my courtesy has never been abused except on this one occasion. I stated to Mr. Adams what my programme was; that I felt it would be a losing fight if the proprietary medicine people should stir up the papers any further against the House provision; that they had already succeeded in making many people believe that it was the Senate bill and not the House bill which contained the drug-labeling provision; that it was my plan to call the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce together just before the pure-food bill came up for actual consideration in the House and ask the committee to adopt a stringent amendment in place of the one which had been given out to the public; that I had canvassed the committee as to the attitude of each individual member upon it and felt absolutely confident of success, but that if this were known it would stir up the Proprietary Medicine Association, and we would again commence to receive urgent pleas from all parts of the country to take the Senate bill (containing nothing on the subject) in place of the House bill.

I talked freely and fully to Mr. Adams while the Daily News correspondent was sitting within hearing distance at the typewriting machine, but was not actually typewriting on the machine most of the time. That correspondent walked out of my room after listening to my confidential talk with Mr. Adams and published my proposition. Immediately the proprietary association got in its work, and we have been flooded for some time past by newspaper advice urging that the Senate bill should be adopted, claiming that the House leaders were trying to hold up the pure-food bill and that the only thing to do was to pass the Senate bill. I have no doubt that most of the newspaper articles were written in good faith, but they were based upon information and statements furnished by gentlemen in the pay of the proprietary medicine association. The story has been spread wide and far that the Senate bill contained the provision requiring the labeling of the narcotics and that the House bill proposed to legalize the use of these narcotics. That story has been spread through the influence and the pay of the proprietary-medicine people. Newspaper men necessarily rely upon statements which are made to them from many sources. They have been woefully imposed upon in this case. Even the medical associations have sent resolutions to us urging that the House "accept the Senate bill requiring the labeling of narcotics in place of the House bill legalizing their use." But I am thankful to say that the Members of the House have exhibited a marked degree of confidence in the members of our committee urging the passage of this bill, and they have accepted, without question, our statement that the House bill did require the thing which the newspapers stated it did not.

The provision on this subject which is now in the bill requires that as to medicines the package shall bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of any alcohol, morphine, opium, cocaine, heroin, alpha or beta eucaine, chloroform, cannabis indica, chloral hydrate, or acetanilide, or any derivative or preparation of any such substances contained therein. This is the most stringent provision upon this subject which has ever been adopted by any legislative body. It will be one of the most popular provisions of the pure-food and drug bill. The origin of that provision was in the House of Representatives. It has been put into the bill by the House. The country owes to the House that portion of the pure-food law, as well as many other of the best and most stringent features in the law.

As we report the bill back from the conference committee now it does not omit one single provision of any importance which was in the bill as it passed the Senate. It has not been weakened any from the Senate bill, but it has been greatly strengthened by various provisions which have been inserted in the House.

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to close without saying a word in regard to Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry. While in some important respects I have been unable to fully agree with Doctor Wiley's opinions, yet he and I have formed a close friendship in connection with the consideration of pure-food legislation, and I have constantly sought his advice as well as his knowledge of facts. We owe much to him.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the pure-food bill, which will surely become a law, is a distinct step forward, and I believe it will prove itself to be one of the most valuable and most popular laws ever placed upon the statute books. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WATSON). The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HEPBURN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BLACKFEET INDIAN RESERVATION, MONT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without approval H. R. 19681, entitled "An act to survey and allot the lands embraced within the limits of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and to open the surplus lands to settlement," calling attention to the inclosed report of the Acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and especially to that portion of the report running as follows:

"Attention is invited to the fact that all of the waters of the reservation are at once subject to appropriation under the laws of the State of Montana, but such appropriation shall not be held to create a right adverse to any Indian allottee who actually appropriates water or for whom an actual appropriation is made to the extent that may be necessary for use on the allotment within two years from the date of the President's proclamation opening the surplus lands to settlement. While this language would seem to have been designed to protect the water rights of the Indian allottees, I am strongly of the belief that in practice it will fail to do so. In the first place, there will be a necessary delay of several days before the allotments can be made, owing to the fact that the reservation is not surveyed, and even after it is surveyed and allotments made thereafter no actual appropriation of waters can be made by the Indians or for them, as they have no means to construct the necessary irrigation ditches, and this bill makes no appropriation to aid them in so doing. They will derive no funds from their surplus lands for this purpose for several years at least after the issuance of the President's proclamation. If this bill becomes law, I think it will be found that a very large part of the waters of the reservation will at once, or within a very short time, be appropriated by white settlers living outside thereof and that irrigation works will be constructed for their use. When the time comes when the Indian allottee is ready to appropriate water it will in all probability have been completely appropriated and fully used by white settlers who have expended large sums on their irrigation works and other improvements in making homes for themselves. True, under the terms of this bill the Indians seem to have a right to take the water from the white settlers, but the practical difficulties against doing this, in the light of what has just been said, are, in my opinion, too obvious to require extended comment."

I am anxious to favor in every way the actual bona fide homesteaders of northern Montana, and I will gladly sign any bill which will thus favor them, provided that it explicitly and unequivocally guarantees to the Indians their water rights—that is, the right of each Indian to a sufficiency of water to make his allotment of real use to him. Subject to this guaranty, and also of course to the certainty that the action of the Government will redound not to the benefit of one individual or corporation who wishes to exploit the water rights, but to the benefit of the actual settlers, I will gladly approve any bill which may be drawn to achieve the purposes of this bill without containing its defects.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, June 29, 1906.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I move to refer the message and the accompanying documents to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas to refer the message and the accompanying documents to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

ANNUITIES OF THE SAC AND FOX INDIANS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President:

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without approval H. R. 10133, entitled "An act to provide for the annual pro rata distribution of the annuities of the Sac and Fox Indians of the Mississippi between the two branches of the tribe, and to adjust the existing claims between the two branches as to said annuities," for the reasons enumerated in the accompanying extract from the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs of February 12, and the letters of the Acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs of June 25 and of June 28. I have directed the Acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs to have an immediate and thorough investigation made of the matter in accordance with the concluding paragraph of his letter of June 28, and after the report of this investigation has reached me I shall be prepared to give my assent to any bill which shall do justice both to the Indians in Iowa and the Indians in Oklahoma.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 29, 1906.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

ANCHORAGE OF VESSELS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following bill with House amendment disagreed to:

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill (S. 4774) relating to the movements and anchorage of vessels in Hampton Roads, the harbors of Norfolk and Newport News and adjacent waters, in the State of Virginia.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist upon its amendment and agree to a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Speaker pro tempore will appoint the following conferees. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HEPBURN, Mr. MANN, and Mr. RYAN.

RAILROAD, ETC., IN ALASKA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri has nineteen minutes remaining.

Mr. LLOYD. Did I understand the gentleman from Michigan wanted to ask a question?

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman made the statement, and I know he made it in very good faith, but I think under a misapprehension of the facts, that there had been no survey made by the people who were seeking to be incorporated here. As a matter of fact, as I understand it, the testimony does show that these gentlemen have made a survey, and I am not certain whether the testimony shows the amount, but I am informed that they have spent $15,000 on surveys already.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, that is in part true. It is not really a survey, as I understand the testimony. They have made an investigation of the Copper River district and the copper region, and on that investigation they have expended perhaps $15,000. It is an exploration rather than an investigation. There is no preliminary map filed and there is no preliminary survey. There is no question about that.

Mr. HAMILTON. It would not be possible for them, not being incorporated, to file a preliminary survey. The testimony, for instance, on page 61, shows, in the testimony of Mr. Hawkins, that an inquiry was made in relation to a survey, and he said: "Yes, sir; the ground was very carefully examined by Mr. Jamieson and his party, and he very carefully prepared an estimate of the construction expense." And in several places throughout the testimony this is shown.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I will call the gentleman's attention to page 14, where Mr. BURLEIGH says he has examined the route, and to page 61——

Mr. LLOYD. I think there can be no question of difference between us on this question. There has been nothing done by these gentlemen except an examination of the route. They have made no survey in any definite sense, and, as the chairman properly says, they would not have been expected to make a survey, because the company is not yet organized.

Mr. HAMILTON. I said they could not file a survey—that as a company they could not have filed a survey.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman will permit me, as you know I have not attended any of your committee meetings, and I have not taken any particular interest in this matter; but upon the question of expenses I desire to state to the gentleman it was told me to-day by a gentleman, a man whom I have known for a great many years, and in whose truth and veracity I have every confidence—Mr. Burleigh—that he wrote checks to the amount of about $15,000 for the costs in examining this road and such preliminary surveys as were necessary.

Mr. LLOYD. That is not in dispute.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And I am constrained to think that is true.

Mr. LLOYD. It is an examination. He examined that road. And I will go further, and say that they are not ready to file a map of definite survey or preliminary survey.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The party went through there so as to make surveys to locate their road.

Mr. LLOYD. They have made an examination and expended as much as $15,000, perhaps. There is no question; there is no dispute about the facts.

Mr. HAMILTON. I understood the gentleman to say they had made no expenditure.

Mr. LLOYD. No; I never said that. You misunderstood me. I meant there had been no expenditure for survey of a regular character. They have made an examination and expended some money. They have been in the Copper River country exploring the mines, and have explored for coal fields to some extent, and made an examination in reaching them. Now, I want to call attention to another matter. You will doubtless infer from the statement made by my good friend from Michigan that the President had announced himself in favor of this particular road.

If you will read the message of the President on this subject you will find that he has not connected himself with this particular enterprise. And I want to call the attention of the House to another fact that there appeared before the committee at the instance of the committee, in order that it might get full information from the proper source, the Secretary of War, Mr. Taft. In this connection I want to call your attention to what I described a moment ago, which was the fact that there is another road that is attempting to be constructed in this same locality, known as the "Copper River Railroad Company," and that seeks to build a road from Resurrection Bay, Copper River, to Tanana, and from Tanana to Rampart. In the testimony of Mr. Taft, on page 169 of the printed testimony, you will find this statement:

> The plan, as I understand it from Major Richardson, is to construct a trunk line which shall go from the open water of the Gulf of Alaska up into the mining regions and around to the Nome Peninsula. There are two private interests—one which is constructing a railroad from Valdez to the copper mines—

And there is no question as to what that road is. It is the Alaska Central—> and another which is constructing a railroad from Resurrection Bay up to the Tanana mining district. These two lines in a general way would be parallel, but at such a distance from each other that I should not think they could be called parallel. They would ultimately reach Fairbanks by different routes, and then the route is to continue down the Tanana Valley to Rampart, and then from Rampart over to Nome.

The road that is sought to be incorporated does not go within 300 or 400 miles of Fairbanks. It goes to Eagle City.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question.

Mr. LLOYD. If you will excuse me just a moment, until I read this:

> Whether those two lines—the Alaska Central and the Copper River lines—will be constructed by private capital or not is, of course, a question for the committee to decide. If they can be constructed by private capital, of course it is better that they should be.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman why this company can not incorporate under the general law?

Mr. LLOYD. This company can incorporate under the general law, but they do not wish to do so.

Mr. LACEY. What disadvantage would it be to any other company if this company is singled out for the benefit of a Congressional charter?

Mr. LLOYD. There must be some benefit by reason of a charter, else they would not ask it. They are wanting some advantage that is not obtained under existing law, or they would not seek the charter.

Mr. LACEY. Let me ask if this proposed charter varies materially from the right-of-way act of 1898?

Mr. LLOYD. It varies in some respects. It varies especially in two respects. One is that it extends the time within which the road must be constructed from four to eight years, and it provides that 250 miles of road must be constructed within five years, and the most material difference in that particular is in reference to the forfeiture. Under the law which you framed, and for which you are responsible, as I understand it, the forfeiture is made as a matter of course if they fail to comply with the terms of their contract. But under this bill, if it becomes a law, there will not be a forfeiture of the terminal facilities under any circumstances.

Mr. HAMILTON. Oh, yes; there will be.

Mr. LACEY. Forfeiture only under the direction of the President—an Executive forfeiture?

Mr. HAMILTON. The forfeiture was advised by the Secretary of the Interior after many interviews with him.

Mr. LACEY. I would ask if it does not give 2,560 acres instead of 60?

Mr. LLOYD. I will read:

> And provided further, That if said Alaska Railroad Company shall not complete and put in operation at least 250 miles of its said railroad within five years from the passage of this act, all the lands granted by or purchased under this act shall revert to the United States, except the terminal and station grounds and right of way mentioned in section 2 of this act.

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman will concede that that is a matter we discussed a good deal. The gentleman will also concede they ought to have their right of way and 160 acres of terminal lands. I think the gentleman will concede they ought to have that much left. If they do not construct 250 miles, we could not confiscate that, and would not want to.

Mr. LLOYD. As to the question of the terminal itself, this 2,560 acres of land that is sought to be given to them rather than to any other road would probably be construed as part of the terminals of the road and would not be forfeited.

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman from Iowa asked whether this would operate injuriously upon any other railroad. The gentleman from Missouri will remember, I think, that from time to time gentlemen who appeared before the committee were interrogated as to the fact, and Senator Turner, for instance, who appeared before the committee, said that he could see no way in which a Federal charter for this company would affect injuriously the road which he represented and the one that Mr. Gordon represented—the so-called "Bruner road." Did not Mr. Gordon state that so far as he knew the corporation he represented would not be injuriously affected? And so on through. I think the gentleman will agree with me it was so.

Mr. LLOYD. I agree that the statements were made that the gentleman refers to. There are no other hearings in reference to this matter—that was months ago—since then. I think I am saying nothing that is improper. These parties, after careful examination of the bill—the Bruner people and the Copper River people—were led to oppose the passage of this bill because they feared it would seriously interfere with their scheme.

Mr. YOUNG. I suppose these roads would prefer this road should not be built at all, because it would be a competing line.

Mr. LLOYD. The truth is, I think—I may be mistaken—that if this road is built the Copper River road will not be, nor will the Bruner road.

Mr. HAMILTON. What would prevent?

Mr. LLOYD. Because there is not enough traffic in there for two trunk lines traveling over the same territory up the Yukon River.

Mr. HAMILTON. You mean by the Copper River road or the Bruner road?

Mr. LLOYD. No; if the Burleigh road should be built, probably neither of the others would.

Mr. HAMILTON. Who are the incorporators of the Copper River road?

Mr. LLOYD. I do not know who the incorporators are. I know this——

Mr. HAMILTON. They have not done anything.

Mr. LLOYD. Oh, yes; I know the Copper River Company is the one that is represented on the outside, as you are aware, by Mr. Shaffroth, of California.

Mr. HAMILTON. Have they filed any preliminary survey?

Mr. LLOYD. They have filed a preliminary survey.

Mr. HAMILTON. It is an English company, is it not?

Mr. LLOYD. It is not an English company; it is organized in Washington as an American company.

Mr. HAMILTON. The incorporators are largely English and Canadians, are they not?

Mr. LLOYD. They are all American stockholders, as far as I have known.

Mr. HAMILTON. The incorporators?

Mr. LLOYD. And if you will excuse me on this question, I will read a letter from the attorney of that road:

CHICAGO, May 29, 1906.

HON. JAMES T. LLOYD,
Committee on Territories, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiry I will say that I am a member of the firm of Close Brothers & Co., composed partly of American and partly of English members, which financed the White Pass and Yukon route and is now aiding in the financing of the Copper River Railway Company, a corporation incorporated under the laws of the State of Washington, which is now building a railroad up Copper River solely on American territory, under the general act of May 14, 1898. The preliminary actual survey for 200 miles has been completed at a cost of above $50,000, and the map thereof filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior and accepted. Three surveying parties are now in the field checking up the survey and fixing the definite location of the road. The contract for the construction of 200 miles of the road has been let to Mr. M. J. Heney, of Seattle, Wash., who is now at work grading the same, and we expect to have the contract completed by the close of the season of 1907. The Copper River Railway Company also has purchased and paid for its tidewater terminals at a cost of over $50,000.

The White Pass and Yukon route never received a dollar of subsidy or one foot of land or other aid from the Canadian or any other government. On the contrary, it was claimed in Canada by the promoters of rival companies that because its tide-water terminus was at Skagway, on American Territory, it was an American road. The White Pass and Yukon Railway Company is a corporation operating the White Pass and Yukon route by means of local companies, of which latter I act as president, but I do not consider that this is material, as the territory to be served by the Copper River Railway is entirely American, subject to American laws, and distinct from the territory served by the White Pass and Yukon route, which is many hundreds of miles away and in no wise competitive.

There is no foreign interest or foreign capital in the Copper River enterprise, unless my firm is to be considered foreign. The control and management of the Copper River Railway is as purely American as that of any railway in the United States.

Respectfully, yours, L. H. GRAVES.

Mr. HAMILTON. Is that company financed by some London brokers?

Mr. LLOYD. I have just explained by whom it is financed. And now, in this connection, Mr. Burleigh, who represents this proposed enterprise for which this bill seeks the incorporation, gave his testimony before the committee.

But let me first say my friend the chairman of this committee by this query would indicate that he is very anxious that this road, when constructed, shall be an American road, controlled by American citizens. Let us see about it.

Mr. Burleigh said:

Mr. BURLEIGH. I would not hesitate a minute to say that the combination there would represent and control $100,000,000; not that each man has got his proportion of that in his own right—I do not mean that. Of course when a man gets beyond a million dollars it is hard to tell what he is worth; but I would say that those gentlemen would easily represent or control $100,000,000, and I can say further that there are important financial interests, both in this country and abroad, that are likely to become interested in this matter, provided the investigations of the country bear out the statements I make in regard to the resources.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. WANGER. Are the grants of coal and other lands in this bill contingent, or are they absolute and may they be availed of by this company, whether it ever builds any railroad or not?

Mr. LLOYD. My impression is that they can hold the lands they buy, whether they construct the road or not.

Mr. WANGER. Is the price fixed in the bill?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes; the price is fixed.

Mr. WANGER. Is that the market value, or is it such a low value that it is giving them a favor?

Mr. LLOYD. This bill provides that, in addition to terminal facilities which are authorized under the law, about 60 acres, they are permitted to have 2,560 acres of land and pay $2.50 an acre for it, and in addition to that they are given the mud flats, consisting of that part of the land lying between low tide and high tide.

Mr. YOUNG. Can you tell whether this land has any market value at the present time?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I am of the opinion that lands in Alaska now have no value; but if it happens that you give to this company 2,560 acres of land, extending 2 miles along the bay, and a town grows up there, as they think it will, of several hundred thousand inhabitants, then that 2,560 acres of land will become exceedingly valuable.

Mr. YOUNG. There is no probability of that occurring, however, unless this railroad is built, is there?

Mr. LLOYD. Unless some railroad is built. If there is a road built to the interior, then Alaskan property will become valuable; but the point I am undertaking to make is that this Congress is not concerned to make choice between railroad companies. Here are two companies, both of whom say they want no help, and both of whom say they will construct the road without any assistance.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, there have been so many interruptions in various ways that I have not been able to keep tab on the clock. I agreed to yield to some gentleman, and I should like to have ten minutes more. I am perfectly willing that there shall be ten minutes on the other side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that inasmuch as this debate is being conducted under a rule, it would not be in order to extend the time except by unanimous consent.

Mr. LLOYD. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. DWIGHT. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LLOYD. Without objection, I will file as part of my remarks the minority report, as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

We do not concur in the views of the majority.

No sufficient reason has been given for the passage of the bill.

The bill charters the Alaska Railway Company and authorizes it to construct a railroad and telegraph and telephone line between Cordova Bay and Eagle City in Alaska and makes certain grants and concessions to the company.

No other railroad or corporation doing business in Alaska has been organized under special act of Congress, and we see no satisfactory excuse for the action attempted here.

We think it unwise to give this company any advantage not given to other railroads already incorporated which have made investments thereunder and are seeking to develop the interior of Alaska. We are not in favor of giving this company special recognition by Congressional action to the detriment and discouragement of railroad companies now engaged in railroad construction in Alaska.

The proposed company has no organization; it has made no preliminary survey; it has done no work in definite location; it has built no part of a railroad. There is no guaranty that if this bill becomes a law that it ever will organize a company or build a railroad. The incorporators are reputed to be wealthy citizens, but there is no assurance from any source that these men will subscribe the stock or any part of it that is necessary to the construction of the proposed road.

There are two companies already incorporated which are now engaged in the work preliminary to the construction of their roads to the interior of Alaska from the Pacific coast and up the Copper River to the Yukon region. Both these companies have expended thousands of dollars, and have filed their maps of actual survey with the Secretary of the Interior, and are proceeding to the work of construction by letting contracts for the building of their roads. Both companies are reputed to be composed of stockholders who are immensely rich and whose ability to construct the road is unquestioned.

These companies ask no assistance from the Government, and insist that no aid is needed and that it is unfair to them to give aid to any rival enterprise. We think their request is reasonable and that legislation sought by this bill is unjust to them and ought not to be enacted.

The pending bill greatly changes existing law in making grants of land, extension of time for surveys and construction of road, exemption from taxation, and in other ways makes specific legislation favorable to this proposed railroad, which we think unwise and unfair to those who have in good faith entered upon railway enterprises and may have the effect of discouraging the construction of railroads in the interior of Alaska.

JAMES T. LLOYD.
JACK BEALL.
E. Y. WEBB.
JNO. M. REYNOLDS.
A. O. STANLEY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, this subject has been looked after almost entirely by my colleague [Mr. CUSHMAN], who introduced the bill with reference to this matter in the first instance. Mr. CUSHMAN is thoroughly familiar with all the details of the bill and the testimony that has been given before the committee, but he is sick to-day and it is impossible for him to be here. I can not speak with reference to the measure from particular knowledge concerning the testimony given before the committee. All that I can say is simply in a general way concerning the necessity of having railroads in Alaska, no matter how they may come. There seems to be no disagreement between the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] as to the importance of securing the construction of railroads there, but the main difference appears to be as to the incorporation of this company by an act of Congress. Now, it appears from the testimony in the case that the other railroad companies that were represented before the committee did not object to this bill, so far as this company was concerned, or, rather, stated that it would not interfere with the construction of their road.

I understand there is one company interested that did not appear before the committee. I think it certainly had an opportunity to appear, because there was abundance of time given to the consideration of this proposition. It appears, under the terms of this bill, that this company is required within five years to actually construct more miles of railway in Alaska than are now constructed. They must within five years construct 250 miles of railway or else lose forever the lands that they have purchased, and so forth. There also seems to be an idea that there are large grants of land made to this company—coal lands, etc. I judge this from the question asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER]. He asked whether these lands would be forfeited if they did not construct the road. Here is a proviso, on page 10 of the bill, which reads as follows:

Provided further, That if said Alaska Railroad Company shall not complete and put in operation at least 250 miles of its said railroad within five years from the passage of this act, all the lands granted by or purchased under this act shall revert to the United States, except the terminal and station grounds and right of way mentioned in section 2 of this act.

So that all grounds outside of the right of way, outside of the terminals, are forfeited even if they pay money for them. They are forfeited if they do not complete the construction of 250 miles of railway within five years. As I understand this bill, also the only provision made by which this company can secure coal lands in Alaska is that they are permitted to purchase 1 square mile, or 640 acres, but they must pay $10 an acre for that. So that there is no privilege granted, there is no bonus or gift or anything of that sort, and no large body of land can be secured by this company. It seems to me that if by the passage of this bill we can secure the construction of 250 miles of railway in five years or 525 miles of railway in about eight years we ought to pass the act. We have also authorized companies to take rights of way, make surveys, and locate lines of railway there, and yet they have been coming to Congress for extension of time, Congress after Congress, so that it seems to me that if this will not injure these other companies, if they do not object to it, if they say that the passage of this act will not interfere with the construction of their lines, if it will insure the construction of another line of railway there, then we should pass it, because they need it in that country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] inadvertently, owing to the confusion, occupied more time than he expected and had promised to yield to a colleague a little time. I therefore ask unanimous consent that he may have six minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to call attention to one or two things the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] referred to. The gentleman spoke about a certain railroad company which he said had been organized and proposed to extend a road from Resurrection Bay northeasterly. He admits the incorporators of that railroad are English and Americans. The information which I have is that the gentlemen who propose to incorporate that company are the gentlemen who control the White Pass and Yukon road, which now controls practically all the traffic down the Yukon River in Canada and a large part of the traffic in American territory as far down as Fairbanks. We regard it as a patriotic American enterprise to give to American people a right to construct a road here. The objection these gentlemen have is that they do not want their line paralleled by an American railroad on American soil. We are doing no more here, nowhere nearly as much, as Canada is doing on her soil for her railroads. A railroad is being projected across Canada now, known as the "Grand Trunk Pacific," and the eastern half of that road, about 1,900 miles, is being constructed by the Canadian government, and the whole of those 1,900 miles will be turned over to the proposed company on a 3 per cent basis by the Canadian government. On the western half of that road, in what is known as the "prairie country," the Canadian government is giving a cash bonus of $12,000 per mile. In that part of the road known as the "mountain country" the Canadian government is contributing three-fourths of the cost of every mile of that railroad. Their western terminus is Port Simpson. They propose to control this traffic as far as they can. The Stewart River Railroad, which it is proposed to extend across northwestern Canada as a branch of the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian government proposes to aid to the extent of $6,400 per mile. What are we doing here? Almost nothing in comparison with that. We are enabling this corporation to buy at $2.50 an acre land which they are entitled to buy of the Government at $2.50 per acre.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not true that other lines of road are now being constructed——

Mr. HAMILTON. No; not to any extent.

Mr. MONDELL. Under the general law over the line these people propose to construct and through which they are given rights?

Mr. HAMILTON. The fact is that seven or eight companies have filed preliminary surveys and have not been able to get away from the starting point, except the Alaska Central Railroad. They have filed these preliminary surveys, it is true. The fact is that the reason why we are proposing to aid the company is because ever since this general railroad act, which does not permit the incorporation of a railroad, has been on the statute books, none of these companies have been able to succeed in constructing a railroad. We want a railroad across here from Controller Bay to Eagle, on the Yukon, to open up the internal resources of Alaska. We want another railroad across here, from Seward to Fairbanks, to open up the internal resources of that country. We believe it will be done, and when that is done other railroad companies may perhaps construct.

Mr. MONDELL. My information is that companies are at this time constructing.

Mr. HAMILTON. They are not to any extent. That is the difficulty.

Mr. MONDELL. Their rights of way have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HAMILTON. They have filed their preliminary surveys under the law. One company, as I understand, has done some little work near Valdez, but not a rail has been laid, as I understand, and not a tie has been put down, as I understand. If a tie or a rail has been laid, this would do them no harm. Those roads generally tend in the direction of the copper country. They want to get in and get the copper and the coal. Here is a project which runs up across the country 525 miles.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BEALL of Texas) there were—ayes 88, noes 50.

So the bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LACEY) there were—ayes 104, noes 49.

Mr. LLOYD. Tellers, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As many as favor the taking of the vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After the counting.] Thirty-seven gentlemen have arisen—not a sufficient number.

Mr. LLOYD. The other side, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no other side for tellers, the Chair will state to the gentleman. One-fifth of the last vote——

A MEMBER. Thirty-seven is more than a fifth.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One-fifth of a quorum is required for tellers, and the Chair will state that is a fixed number. But thirty-seven gentlemen rose, and tellers were denied. The ayes have it, and the bill is passed. [Applause.]

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CURTIS, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 15673. An act for the relief of Harry A. Young.

ISTHMIAN EXPOSITION, TAMPA, FLA.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk with amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following concurrent resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution 28.

Whereas it is fitting that the commencement of the work on the Panama Canal should be celebrated in a suitable manner by an exhibition of the resources, development, and progress of the United States, to the end that the importance of this great isthmian waterway may be accentuated and the sentiment in favor of its early completion fostered and kept alive; and

Wheras such an exhibition should be of a national character and should have the sanction of the United States Government; and

Whereas the city of Tampa, in the State of Florida, by reason of its being farther to the southward and nearer to said canal than any other city in the country having a deep and commodious harbor, reached by ample railroad facilities, as also on account of its salubrious climate and the spirit of American progress among its citizens, manifest in the rapid growth and development of the city and her commerce, affords a suitable place for such an exhibition; and

Whereas it has been determined to hold such an exposition there during the months of January, February, March, April, and May, A. D. 1908; and

Whereas his excellency Napoleon B. Broward, governor of the State of Florida, did on the 30th day of December, 1905, issue his proclamation calling an isthmian exposition to be held in the city of Tampa, commencing in the month of January, A. D. 1908, for the purpose aforesaid, and inviting the governors of the several States comprising the United States of America, as well as the governors of the Territories of the United States, to secure the cooperation of their State legislatures in aid of said exposition by participating therein and sending exhibits of their resources to said exposition: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to issue his proclamation to the governors of the several States, inviting them to participate in said exposition by sending exhibits thereto showing their growth, development, and progress; and that the President be further requested to hold a naval review in Tampa Bay at such time during the progress of said exposition as he may deem best.

Resolved further, That the President cause to be made such display of the Army of the United States at said exposition as he may deem advisable.

The amendments were read, as follows:

On page 2, line 7, between the word "be" and the word "further," insert the words "and he is hereby."

On page 2, line 7, between the word "review" and the word "in," insert the words "at his discretion."

On page 2, line 10, between the word "President" and the word "cause," insert the words "of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to."

On page 3, after line 2, insert the following:

"Resolved further, That nothing contained in this concurrent resolution shall be construed as committing the United States to any obligation hereafter to appropriate money for expenses or expenditures or liabilities of any kind or character made or incurred by anyone for the entertainment of the guests of such exposition, or in connection with such celebration and exhibition."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know something about the resolution before giving consent.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is very clearly stated in the resolution itself. The people of Tampa, and I may say of Florida, intend in good faith to hold an exhibition at the city of Tampa for the purpose of celebrating the commencement of work on the Panama Canal——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve the right to object.

Mr. SPARKMAN. This exposition is to open early in January, 1908, and to continue for four or five months. The governor of the State of Florida has already issued his proclamation inviting the governors of the various States to send exhibits there and to otherwise participate in the exposition. Now, the resolution that has just been read here is not just the resolution that the House will act upon if unanimous consent is given for its consideration. I propose to offer some amendments which will materially change the resolution as read.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What I would like to know is what the resolution requires the Federal Government to do in connection with that exposition?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The resolution, as it will be amended, will require the Federal Government to do nothing except the holding of a naval review in the waters of Tampa Bay, which it requests the President to do, and to make such display of the Army there as he may see proper, all to be in his discretion, without any expense whatever to the United States Government.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have no objection to the measure.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my friend from Florida several questions. Is there any special reason why this exposition should be held at Tampa? Would not there be an equal reason for holding an exposition at Pensacola, New Orleans, Galveston, or, in fact, on the Atlantic coast? I would also like to ask why this should have the sanction of the Government of the United States?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Ohio that the only reason, if any, why this exposition should be held at Tampa and not at some other place is that stated in the resolution, that Tampa is nearer to Panama than any other city with a deep-water harbor reached by railroad facilities.

Then, again, I have heard of no other place wanting or proposing to hold such an exposition. So I take it that no other place will be applying to Congress to take any action like this. The resolution, I will say further, is certainly unobjectionable from every standpoint, because it does not propose to call on the Government at any time for money to pay any part of the expenses of the exposition; and I say here and now, so far as I am concerned, I will never call on Congress for a cent. And it seems to me that if the people of the State of Florida are willing to go down into their pockets for the purpose of holding this exposition, and the people of any of the other States are willing to assist in it, Congress should raise no objection, as the Government will not be injured.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Does the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] state that at no time and under no circumstances is it expected that any appropriation will be asked from the United States Government?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I so state.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. For this exposition?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I state that most emphatically, as far as I am concerned; and I do not think that anybody here will do so over my head or protest.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Would not certain expenses be incurred, however, by the United States Government if this exposition was held?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think not. The resolution provides that the Government shall be at no expense whatever, and I can see no expense in sight. Perhaps I did not make myself clearly understood. I propose to offer some amendments here which will eliminate the feature that was read in the resolution a moment ago requiring the President to invite the governors of the States, so that all that will be left will be the request of the President to hold the naval review and to make such military display of the Army as he may see proper, the whole to be done without any expense to the Government of the United States.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Is it expected that there will be a Government exhibit?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Is the gentleman from Florida able to state how much money will be raised by the State of Florida, or by the municipality of Tampa, or private parties, combined?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I can not state that, but I am told they propose to raise all that is necessary, so far as the State of Florida is concerned.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. The gentleman states, "so far as the State of Florida is concerned."

Mr. SPARKMAN. So far as the participation in it by the State of Florida is concerned, and if any part of the Army should go there—there would be but a few companies at most—it will be expected that the State of Florida or somebody there shall pay the expenses of transportation.

Mr. HULL. Does this bill carry an appropriation to pay the expenses of the Army and Navy?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No, sir; it does not.

Mr. HULL. Well, the regular appropriation will not do it. We cut them down in the Army to the lowest possible point.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say, first, the Navy will have to be supported, no matter where it is, and it is usually in those southern waters during the winter and spring of the year. It is very frequently sent to Pensacola and other places in that region, where it makes more or less of a display under the orders of the President or, what is the same thing, of the Navy Department. But if any part of the Army goes down there, one, two, or three companies, or a regiment, somebody will have to pay their traveling expenses. The Government would not do it without authority. So the expense would necessarily fall on some one else. We had a company of United States cavalry down there last year at our State fair, and the fair association had to pay for its transportation.

Mr. HULL. How many does this propose to take down?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is left to the discretion of the President entirely.

Mr. HULL. The President might order a division down there, if you wanted them badly, and that would be a good deal of expense.

Mr. SPARKMAN. He could do that anyway. This resolution is certainly as harmless as any that could be introduced in this body. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to have five minutes on this proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the reserving clause and insert:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to hold a naval review at Tampa Bay at such time during the progress of said exposition as he may deem best.

"Resolved further, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to cause to be made such display of the Army of the United States at said exposition as he may deem advisable."

Resolved further, That nothing contained in this concurrent resolution shall be construed as committing the United States to any obligation hereafter to appropriate money for expenses or liabilities of any kind or character made or incurred by anyone for the entertainment of the guests of such exposition or in connection with such celebration and exposition.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Florida yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I did not object to this resolution, because of the most urgent importunity of gentlemen on the floor, and because of their private assurances that under no circumstances would the United States be called upon to appropriate a dollar of money for this show at Tampa, and not because my judgment approved of it, and not because I did not believe that some other gentlemen would come in here and the House and the Senate will run away with an appropriation for this object in the future. I have been fighting these things for some time, and I have made up my mind that the only way to get rid of them is to go in for every show, not by my vote, that any communities want, and let the people see the foolish extravagance into which we are running in this direction.

It is only a year or two ago that I had the pleasure of going through the bill for a naval exposition down here on the James River, and I was told that no appropriation would ever be asked of Congress for that exposition down there, and the assurances were as strong as they are upon this subject to-day. I went through the bill and struck out in blue pencil every reference to the show in any way, shape, or manner in that bill that provided for a naval exhibit to occur in certain months of the summer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The same thing was in the Buffalo bill in the beginning.

Mr. PAYNE. I know it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is in all of them.

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly; and if it is any answer, I acknowledge that I went wrong on the Buffalo bill; but I do not intend to vote for any more of these so long as my name is on the rolls of the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. The gentleman says he has been fighting these bills for a long time. What success have you had?

Mr. PAYNE. I will tell the gentleman in a minute.

In this Jamestown matter every reference to an exposition was taken out of that bill. What is the result? Why, we are here now with an appropriation agreed to by the committees on the sundry civil bill for $1,350,000 for a place down there where we actually have to appropriate $400,000 in building a dock or docks by which we can approach the place. Now, that is the rediculous position that we are in. I have no doubt but that this Tampa business will loom up, and Congress will engage in the same way with a resolution from some other community and go into the show business. It is time the Government got out of the show business. The time will come after the people have breathed a while on the subject. But there is a day when it will come. Congress can not tell when, but it will not be until the people begin to see the ridiculousness of the Government continuing in the show business; and then I hope there will be a sufficient revulsion of feeling to compel Members of the House and Members of Congress to refrain from getting into such a performance as we are entering upon by the passage of this resolution at this time. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. I object to that, Mr. Speaker. I want the privilege of voting against it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. SIBLEY. I would like two minutes before the vote is taken.

Mr. Speaker, I have at some time or other had to vote either for or against every exposition that has been held, commencing with Chicago, and I have sworn off and declared that I would never vote another dollar to any exposition. When my friend from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] came to me, knowing that I have a residence on the shores of the most beautiful bay in the world, Tampa Bay, on the west coast of Florida, I read his bill carefully and found that it did not provide for the expenditure of one penny from the Federal Treasury, and it declares that it never shall cause the expenditure of one penny by the Government. It authorizes the President, in his wisdom and at his discretion, to cause the fleet to rendezvous and display within the borders of that bay, at Tampa, where the people hold each year a State fair that I have never seen equaled by any Commonwealth in our Federal Union. [Applause.] The display of citrous fruits and of semitropic products is the most marvelous that is afforded by any Commonwealth in this country.

This bill simply provides that during the holding of that fair the President may, in his discretion, rendezvous the fleet at that point. That fleet will be rendezvousing or sailing through some portion of the Caribbean Sea. It will be in those waters, and this merely provides that it may rendezvous at that point, and that the Federal troops stationed adjacent to that point may, in his discretion, also be afforded the opportunity to exhibit.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman I have seen just as fine an exhibit as the one he describes now at Jacksonville, and I presume Jacksonville will come on in due time.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to admitting that Jacksonville holds a good display, but it could not, of course, rival Tampa, or I would not be going over to Tampa to live.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania be there in all his glory when this exhibit takes place? If he is there, of course we shall all want to go. [Applause.]

Mr. SIBLEY. I hope the fact that there can be no appropriation from the Federal Treasury will prompt every gentleman to vote for this measure, and I will be there ready to extend a welcome to one and all. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I have been one of the Spartan few who have voted uniformly against every exposition a project for which has been presented to the House—Chicago, Nashville, Buffalo, St. Louis, Jamestown, all of them—because it took money out of the Treasury for a purpose that I did not think was legitimate, according to my views.

This bill, however, is totally unlike any bill that has ever come before the House, even in the initiatory stages of the other bills. This bill merely provides—to use a French expression—that the President be requested by Congress, "if in his opinion" it is expedient, to permit the Navy and the Army to "assist" at the performance; that is, to be present. That is all there is in it. Then at the end of it there is an absolute obligation in the bill itself never to call for anything further.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say that was all there was to that Jamestown thing in the first place.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That was not all there was in the Jamestown thing, and that is the reason I voted against the Jamestown thing. There was in the Jamestown bill a provision to invite foreign powers to participate. There is no such provision in this bill. There was, moreover, no pledge in the body of the bill, as to the Jamestown exposition, that there would be no future requests to Congress for an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. PAYNE) there were—ayes 125, noes 30.

Accordingly the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I offer an amendment to the preamble.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment to the preamble, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the preamble and insert:

"Whereas it is fitting that the commencement of the work on the Panama Canal should be celebrated in a suitable manner, to the end that the importance of this great isthmian waterway may be accentuated and the sentiment in favor of its early completion fostered and kept alive; and

"Whereas the city of Tampa, in the State of Florida, by reason of its being farther to the southward and nearer to said canal than any other city in the country having a deep and commodious harbor, reached by ample railroad facilities, as also on account of its salubrious climate and the spirit of American progress among its citizens, manifest in the rapid growth and development of the city and her commerce, affords a suitable place for such an exhibition; and

"Whereas it has been determined to hold such an exposition at Tampa, Fla., during the months of January, February, March, April, and May, A. D. 1908; and

"Whereas His Excellency Napoleon B. Broward, governor of the State of Florida, did, on the 30th day of December, 1905, issue his proclamation calling an isthmian exposition to be held in the city of Tampa commencing in the month of January, A. D. 1908, for the purpose aforesaid, and inviting the governors of the several States comprising the United States of America, as well as the governors of the Territories of the United States, to secure the cooperation of their State legislatures in aid of said exposition by participating therein and sending exhibits of their resources to said exposition: Therefore, be it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the preamble.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. MANN. Does the city of Tampa need this certificate of good character that is carried in that preamble?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, it won't do any harm, I suggest to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. It sounds to me like the most ridiculous advertisement I have ever heard read.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am sorry the gentleman takes that view.

Mr. MANN. I do not believe the city of Tampa needs a certificate of good character from Congress in that manner.

The SPEAKER. This is an amendment to the preamble. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the adoption of the preamble as amended.

The question was taken; and the preamble as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SPARKMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SUSAN C. SMITH.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be requested to return the bill (H. R. 19047) entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to Susan C. Smith."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

MOVEMENTS OF VESSELS IN HAMPTON ROADS, ETC.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (S. 4774) relating to the movements and anchorage of vessels in Hampton Roads, the harbors of Norfolk and Newport News, and adjacent waters in the State of Virginia, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York presents a conference report and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4774) relating to the movements and anchorage of vessels in Hampton Roads, the harbors of Norfolk and Newport News, and adjacent waters, in the State of Virginia, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same.

W. P. HEPBURN,
JAMES R. MANN,
W. H. RYAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

KNUTE NELSON,
J. H. GALLINGER,
THOMAS S. MARTIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT OF MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

The conferees on the part of the House on the bill (S. 4774) relating to the movements and anchorage of vessels in Hampton Roads, the harbors of Norfolk and Newport News, and adjacent waters, in the State of Virginia, submit the following statement:

The House adopted an amendment providing, in effect, that the act could only be enforced from January 1, 1907, to January 1, 1908. By the conference agreement the Senate recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agrees to the same.

W. P. HEPBURN,
JAMES R. MANN,
W. H. RYAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken; and the conference report was agreed to.

ALASKA CENTRAL RAILWAY.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately after the passage of this resolution it shall be in order to consider in the House, as in the Committee of the Whole (S. 5901), an act to extend the time of the completion of the Alaska Central Railroad, and for other purposes, reported from the Committee on the Public Lands, and forty minutes shall be allowed for debate thereon, the time to be divided equally between those supporting and those opposing the bill, at the end of which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered and a vote taken on all amendments and the bill to its passage, without delay, intervening motion, or appeal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I understand this is the bill that went to the Public Lands Committee and was amended there.

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, this bill has been put into such shape that I shall not ask for any time at all.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Speaker, is it not contemplated when the bill is brought up under this rule to strike out the amendments which the Committee on Public Lands made to the bill?

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I will state that I am unable to answer the question.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned I will say that I think we ought to vote down the amendment. We have just given 2,560 acres to this other line, and these people want only 80 acres. I think the amendment should be stricken out.

Mr. DALZELL. As I understand it, the rule does not permit any vote on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. It permits a vote on the committee amendments.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the committee amendments are amendments of a great deal of importance, and the committee considered them and made the changes in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The rule covers the amendments.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, we do not want the amendments to be put back into the bill.

The SPEAKER. Then they can be voted down.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. This bill was read on a former occasion, as the Chair recollects, on a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. HAMILTON. That is true.

Mr. LACEY. Yes; read on a motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to dispensing with the reading of the bill?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I object, because I think it ought to be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for the compliance by the Alaska Central Railway Company with the provisions of sections 4 and 5 of chapter 295 of the laws of the United States, entitled "An act extending the homestead laws and providing for the right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved May 14, 1898, by locating and completing its railroad in Alaska, is hereby extended, and the powers of said company are enlarged as follows:

First. Said company shall have three years from the passage of this act within which to file a map of definite location, until which time all their rights originally secured by the filing of their plats of preliminary location shall continue, and six years from the date of filing of such maps of definite location within which to complete said railroad to the Tanana River.

Second. That there is hereby granted to said company for terminal purposes and for the building of approaches, wharves, docks, warehouses, elevators, and such other structures as may be necessary for the conduct of the business of said railway, on and contiguous to the Tanana River and the Yukon River, and at such points thereon as the company shall select, public land not exceeding 160 acres at each of said points and having a frontage on each of the said rivers not to exceed 1 mile; and a similar grant of land is hereby made to said company for intermediate division terminals at points on the line of its railway to be selected by it as most convenient for said intermediate division terminals and approximately 100 miles apart.

The land hereby granted shall be located and selected by said company and its rights shall attach thereto when it shall have filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior a plat thereof, with a copy thereof in the local office. Said company shall have the right to enter on and possess said lands immediately, but title shall not vest until the railroad of said company shall have been completed to said points, respectively. There is further hereby granted to said company for similar purposes, on Resurrection Bay, two parcels of public land, one of an area of 1.40 acres and the other of an area of twenty-eight one hundredths acre, which lie between the line of mean high tide on said bay and the east line of the present right of way of the Alaska Central Railway and immediately east of the United States survey No. 726 south and United States survey No. 726 north, F. L. Ballaine soldier's additional homestead location, said two parcels being in addition to the land located by said company for terminal purposes on Resurrection Bay under the provisions of general law.

Third. There is hereby granted the said company the right to purchase at $1.25 an acre the reserve tract between the homestead locations of Scheffler and Ravell on the north shore of Resurrection Bay, said reserve tract having the same depth from the water front as the adjoining homestead locations.

Fourth. Said company shall have the right to locate its right of way along the navigable waters of Alaska and as near thereto as may be necessary for the safe, economical, and efficient construction and operation of its line of railway, any restriction, condition, reservation, or easement provided in, by, or under any act of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding, and the right of way for its railway is granted to said company on Resurrection Bay and at such other points as it may be found desirable to establish terminal facilities on, over, along, and across any roadway established along the shores of navigable waters under the act of Congress of May 14, 1898.

Fifth. Said company shall be exempt from license tax and tax on its railway and railway property during the period of construction and for five years thereafter: Provided, That the total period of exemption shall not exceed ten years from the time of the passage of this act.

Sixth. Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Seventh. Nothing herein contained shall be taken as vacating or impairing the reserved shore roadway and riparian rights provided for under the said act approved May 14, 1898.

With the following committee amendments:

On pages 2 and 3 strike out paragraphs numbered second and third.

Page 4, line 1, after the word "notwithstanding," strike out all the rest of the paragraph.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FOSS. I waive my right to the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] is in control of one-half of the time and——

Mr. SMITH of California. We want some time in opposition to striking out the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] signed the minority report, and one of those gentlemen should control the opposition.

Mr. LACEY. Will the Chair state who controls the time on the other side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are twenty minutes on each side and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] will control the time in opposition.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I only want a very few minutes, to begin with. This bill has been very well explained in the debate upon the bill which has just passed. The difference between this bill and the one which has just passed is that the parties who will be the beneficiaries of this bill have spent nearly $3,000,000 in building 48 miles of road and have given the best evidence of their good faith. They have not asked a charter; they have taken a charter under State laws, and have not asked a special Congressional charter here or any aid of any kind; but what they ask now is additional terminal facilities at Resurrection Bay, an extension of time to complete their work, and, in addition, they ask to have a quarter section of land every hundred miles for a division, a quarter section of land when they reach the Tanana for terminal facilities, and a quarter section when they reach the Yukon for like facilities. That is all they ask, and it is a very modest request.

Mr. MADDEN. Do they want that free of charge?

Mr. LACEY. They ask the lands free of charge except the land on the bay, and they pay for that at Government price.

Mr. MADDEN. How many quarter sections are there, putting it all together?

Mr. LACEY. They get one every hundred miles under this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. How many?

Mr. LACEY. Five hundred miles. They get five quarter sections, and under the general law they get 20 acres for stations every 10 miles, and this increases it. When they come to a divisional point, each hundred miles there they can take 160 acres of land.

Mr. MADDEN. And they do not pay a cent for it.

Mr. LACEY. No; of course not.

Mr. NEEDHAM. How much water front do they get?

Mr. LACEY. Not to exceed a mile. We have just given 4 miles water front to the other road.

Mr. MADDEN. Two miles.

Mr. LACEY. Two thousand five hundred and sixty acres of land. This company pays the Government price for the shore land. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the effect of the amendment?

Mr. LACEY. The effect of the committee amendment is to strike out this grant of 160 acres and strike out the granting of the quarter mile extra on the water front.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mile of water front.

Mr. LACEY. They want an additional quarter, which is reserved between two tracts which they already have. Under the Alaska law, between the homestead or other entries on water fronts there must be a quarter of a mile reserved. This quarter of a mile occurs right at their terminal, and they ask the privilege to buy that quarter of a mile, which would connect their two tracts of land. Now, I do not know, in view of the temper of the House giving four miles——

Mr. HAMILTON. Two miles, as I remember.

Mr. LACEY. Well, say 2 miles—2,560 acres—that there ought to be much debate on this proposition, especially when it comes in in behalf of a company that has spent nearly $3,000,000 in building this road and is at work upon the road now. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss], who introduced the bill.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the attention of the House for just a moment.

I desire to state that I introduced this bill into the House. A similar bill was introduced about the same time in the Senate. This bill was carefully considered by the House Committee on Territories and unanimously reported to this House without any amendment whatever. A similar bill, as I said a moment ago, was introduced in the Senate, and that was unanimously reported by the Committee on Territories to the Senate, and passed the Senate without any amendment whatever, and that is the bill which we are considering to-day in the House. Now, when this bill came over after its passage in the Senate, it went to the Committee on Public Lands. In my judgment, it should have gone to the Committee on Territories. And the Committee on Public Lands held a hasty hearing upon the consideration of this matter. They did not go into a full and careful analysis of it, as they did not have time during the closing days of this session, as did the Committee on Territories, whose hearings upon this question I now hold in my hands.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman yield? The Committee on Public Lands reported this same bill in the last Congress and went over it very thoroughly and had a full hearing.

Mr. FOSS. The Committee on Public Lands in the last Congress practically reported this same bill, but the other day the Committee on Public Lands reported this with some amendments which I do not think, if they had taken careful consideration of this measure and had had time to hold hearings as in the Committee on Territories, they would have reported to this House. Consequently, I trust when it comes to these amendments the House will vote them down, and then the bill will be restored to its original shape and condition, the same as it passed the Senate, the same as it was unanimously reported from the Committee on Territories, and the same as the House, in my judgment ought to pass it to-day.

Now, a moment as to this company, the Alaska Central Company. It is not a company asking for a charter to-day. It already has a charter, and it has had a charter for three or four years. It obtained its charter under the laws of the State of Washington, and it has gone on under the general law in laying out surveys for a railroad in Alaska, and it has already, without any aid from the Government of the United States, built 45 miles of railroad in Alaska. No other American enterprise has done as much as that. It leads them all. It has put in between two million and a half and three millions of dollars into the building of this road, and now it asks for a little aid in the way of extension of time for the completion of the road, and in the way of an extension of its terminals, or a little more land that nobody else would take. As my friend from Michigan said to you a little while ago, it is hardly worth 2½ cents an acre.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. FOSS. I would like three minutes more.

Mr. LACEY. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss].

Mr. FOSS. So it is seeking the right to buy some land at the usual price of $1.25 an acre. Gentlemen, in my judgment, this is the worthiest proposition in connection with the railroads of Alaska of any that have been presented to the House, because the people have gone ahead and built the road, and have never asked a single dollar from the Government in the way of subsidy nor an acre of land in the way of a land grant, nor a guaranty of any kind whatever. They have gone in there on faith, and not only that, with faith plus work actually done and performed. And they are entitled to the favorable consideration of this House.

It costs a good deal of money to build a road up in Alaska. It costs anywhere from $25,000 to $30,000 per mile, and in some places where this road is being constructed it is going to cost $150,000 to $200,000 per mile. And so for these reasons it seems to me if we are going to open up Alaska, with all its boundless resources, to trade and to commerce and to civilization, we ought to do what we can legitimately and rightly to aid these men who have gone forth with such faith in the building up of this road.

I thank the gentleman for yielding me some time. That is all I have to say. [Applause.]

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman from California use a portion of his time now?

Mr. SMITH of California. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, the speech we have just listened to from the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] reminds the House of the time when the great naval appropriation bill was pending for consideration. We are used to seeing the gentleman on those occasions in most vehement manner proclaim the merits of his bill. But just why he, a Representative of the State of Illinois, is so profoundly and so deeply concerned about a railroad away out in Alaska—the passage of a bill which did not come from his committee—one with which, so far as the record shows, he has no connection, I am somewhat confused to know.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that it would be better for legislation in this Congress, it would be better for the estimate in which we hope the American people may hold the Congress of the United States, if gentlemen here were guided in their legislative conduct solely by their oath of office, and that alone. I want to say, too, that so far as I am concerned, this bill, if amended as the gentleman demands, will have to be passed with a quorum of this House present and voting.

I do not intend to permit a railroad or any other corporation or a lot of capitalists from Chicago or elsewhere to come here and exploit the country and rush through measures in which the Treasury of the United States is concerned if I can prevent it. I care nothing about what the Public Lands Committee did in the last Congress. I care nothing about what the Senate Committee may have done. If they have heretofore established bad precedents, it is time for us to break away from them. This bill must stand upon its merits. Gentlemen say it was not considered in a committee of the House, and that is true. And why? Because those interests which can always get the ear of chairmen and members of committees, and which can always get the ear of the Committee on Rules, and can always command—I say it with shame—support on this floor, at least some support; because gentlemen representing these interests came here at the very last hour of the last meeting of the Committee on Public Lands and insisted—supported by lawyers, experts, and capitalists from all parts of the country, interested in this enterprise, and supported by some Members on this floor, who perhaps have some interest, I know not what, in this legislation—and, in effect, demanded immediate consideration of their measure. I say that committee did a wise thing, it did an honest thing, when it struck those provisions which are now in dispute out of the bill.

Why, gentlemen, it has been charged here repeatedly during the last few days, and never denied or explained, that great labor organizations have come here, in most respectful attitude and in most courteous manner, and appealed in vain for consideration of meritorious measures affecting the welfare of millions of American citizens. But let the money power of this country; let men representing great corporations, the capitalists of the nation come here, and we then find as good men as the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands standing here, urging the House to undo that which a majority of his committee, in its judgment, thought proper and wise to do.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, before I take my seat, because I know what will be done—we are not blind to everything—I do not know who would be on the conference committee; and therefore I say to you, if these amendments are reinserted in this bill, it will have to have the approval and support of the majority of the Members of this House before it passes. It will require the presence of a quorum to pass it.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. Did you demand a quorum when we voted 2,500 acres to this other railroad?

Mr. RUCKER. Why, Mr. Speaker, like the gentleman from Iowa, I had no special duty in connection with that bill. I left the gentlemen who were charged with duty in connection with that bill to attend to that duty and contented myself with voting against its passage, because I thought it bad legislation. But I will say to you that in my humble judgment, and I speak with the greatest deference and respect to my friend, I have individual responsibility here. The committee over which you preside by a large vote decided the provisions here in controversy should not be left in the bill, and they struck them out.

Mr. Speaker, I will not have time to analyze this measure, because I want to yield time to others. But I want to say that it will not do to listen to the arguments of—I was about to say of attorneys—it will not do to listen with too much confidence to the arguments of gentlemen from remote States, whose interest is not apparent, as to what this bill does or will do, because, I tell you, in its carefully prepared provisions it carries a great deal more than a superficial investigation will suggest. If these amendments are insisted upon, I warn gentlemen now they will have to have loyal friends here who will support them on its passage, because if enough gentlemen will stand with me and assist me in protecting the people of the United States against this sort of legislation in behalf of corporations it will require a quorum to pass it.

Mr. Speaker, I will not prolong this controversy. I want to yield some time to my colleagues on the committee. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Speaker, I want to see if I can clear up the atmosphere a little on what we consider the demerits of this bill. The Committee on Public Lands made a majority report in favor of the passage of the bill as amended, and I am willing to stand by the committee in that attitude; but notice has been served upon us that when this debate is over and the matter is brought to a vote, that it will be proposed to ask the House to undo what the Committee on Public Lands has done in connection with this bill and pass it in a form in which the Committee on the Public Lands refused to recommend it. I will show the House wherein it differs.

Mr. MONDELL. Did the gentleman support the bill that passed the House a few minutes ago?

Mr. SMITH of California. No; I did not vote either way on that.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman did not oppose it?

Mr. SMITH of California. I did not oppose it, because I did not know anything about it.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows that that bill granted infinitely more than this bill does.

Mr. SMITH of California. I object to the gentleman taking my time on this subject. It is not a question of whether we shall give this railroad 160 acres or 320 acres. Gentlemen lower themselves beneath the dignity of debaters on the floor of this House when they state merely that the land desired is not worth anything up there. The thing that this company is fighting for is the water front. That is all there is in the bill. A law was passed in 1898 with reference to homesteads in Alaska, in which it was specifically provided that homesteads lying near a navigable water should not be more than 80 rods wide, and there should then intervene 80 rods which nobody could take, and there is the express declaration in that law that the Government will not part with its water front, but will hold it in perpetuity for the benefit of the commerce of that country.

This bill now proposes, if these amendments of the committee are stricken out, to give to this railroad company, not so many acres of land—nobody cares for that—but to give to this railroad company 1 mile of water front at its termini and 1 mile of water front wherever it ses fit to touch a navigable stream. Now, that is the part to which the committee was opposed to, and that is the part which I am opposing. I am willing to let the bill go through as the committee reported it, although I think it contains some questionable provisions on another point, but I am not going into that here. I am not, however, willing to sit here and let this Congress blindly vote away the water front of that country. Gentlemen say that this land is of no value and that there is no population in that country. That is very true, and that was substantially true when every transcontinental railroad was built across the United States, and I will say of this bill as the promoters and those railroads did, that it is in anticipation of a population and a commerce in that portion of the country that they propose to build this road. It is perfectly evident that if they did not expect there would be a population and a commerce in that country they would not be here talking about building railroads.

Now, look ahead a little and see the time when there will be a sufficient population and commerce in Alaska to justify the building of a railroad, and then tell me if the water-front privileges are not the key to the situation. The railroad company that controls the water front touched by its line will have the commerce and the rights of the people in its hand, and it can close its hand as tightly as it pleases. The railroads that were built into California more than a quarter of a century ago would have given millions for a provision of that kind in the law granting them the right of way to enter California. And so they would in Washington, or any other portion of the country that has been touched by the transcontinental railroads.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. SMITH of California. I say no man can estimate the value that would accrue to the Central or Southern Pacific Railroad if they had been given such privileges at San Francisco and San Pedro or on any other navigable waters in California as are contained in this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Does not the gentleman know that those railroad companies received vastly greater grants and privileges than is given to this road?

Mr. SMITH of California. That is another consideration. They did not receive in the entire land grants that which represents one-tenth part of the value to them of the water-front privileges that are contained in this bill. I tell you the Southern Pacific to-day would surrender every acre of the land grant that it received for the privilege of controlling the water front on San Francisco and San Pedro bays.

Mr. LACEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think the House should keep an even keel. We passed a bill a short time ago by a large majority granting valuable privileges to a company that has not spent much money in Alaska up to this time, or, so far as I know, built any railroad, and as we now have before us a bill proposing to grant to a company that has built many miles of railroad in Alaska, that has spent millions of dollars in Alaska, a few poor, miserable privileges compared with the grants to the company I have just referred to and infinitesimal compared to the grants and privileges given to railroads built across the continent a few years ago.

The gentleman talks about granting water fronts. We do grant this company the right to take 80 rods on a certain bay which was reserved very properly by the Congress for just such purposes as this, with a view to encouraging the construction of railways, in order that we might have land on tide water to grant to those who desired to build the very expensive railways that must be built in that country. The few acres these people are allowed to buy they pay for at the Government rates.

The gentleman talks about granting a privilege on tide water. No privilege is granted here on tide water that any owner of land adjacent to tide water does not have and enjoy. There are no privileges given on lands below high tide—simply a right to buy certain lands that were reserved with a view of disposing them for the purpose of aiding in the development of the Territory of Alaska. These people have been proceeding under the general law, asking no special grants or privileges of Congress until they found that in order to complete the road which they have so far pushed forward as rapidly as possible, they must have a slight extension of time and have a few more acres of land.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that a similar bill to the one under consideration was referred to the Committee on Territories, considered carefully, and reported favorably. A similar bill was considered by the Senate Committee on Public Lands, reported favorably, and passed the Senate. That bill, which is the bill under consideration, came to the House and was referred to the House Committee on Public Lands, and the House Committee on Public Lands reported it back to the House with some changes in it—that is, they proposed to strike out certain sections whereby it was proposed to give to this company 160 acres of land for a terminal and 160 acres at intervals of 100 miles.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why did not this bill go to the Committee on Territories?

Mr. HAMILTON. I don't know.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, of course it ought to.

Mr. HAMILTON. I think it is a good bill, however.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, the gentleman from Michigan is familiar with all the facts, and yet it was sent to the Land Committee, which knew nothing about it.

Mr. HAMILTON. I feel it my duty to say that I regard it as a good measure, and it is a part of the general plan to give transportation facilities for the interior of Alaska. After consideration our committee thought that if these two trunk lines, one from Controller Bay to Eagle and the other from Seward to Fairbanks, could be constructed, that would open up the internal resources of Alaska.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAMILTON. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Will the gentleman tell us whether or not the granting of this frontage will in any way exclude other people from getting similar privileges in Resurrection Bay?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Of course it will.

Mr. HAMILTON. So far as any of the frontage given is concerned it would exclude other people, but no further than that.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. As I understand it, there is a very large frontage there still left.

Mr. HAMILTON. Yes; I so understand it.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. And this gives only a very small portion.

Mr. HAMILTON. That is my understanding.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. How much is the frontage?

Mr. HAMILTON. It is very small. I don't know how much. These people have spent two and a half million dollars in the construction of this railroad, and have only constructed up to mile 45. They are having great difficulty in selling their bonds.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRICK].

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Speaker, I don't know that I care to take up even two minutes. This bill has come before the Committee on Territories, and we have considered it. We believe that it is a good thing for Alaska. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] seemed to have some idea that everybody that is for this bill had some ulterior interest. I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I have no interest in any railway company in the world, except as that railway company may be a good thing for the world. I have not any interest in this proposition except that it may do good. If Alaska needs anything in the world—it has good men, 30,000 of the bravest, hardiest, and best men of America—it needs transportation facilities, and that is all the reason in the world why I am for this bill. This measure does not cost the United States a single dollar. They talk about its taking up the frontage of the bay. There are 20 miles of frontage on that bay, and it takes up only 1. The reason that I am for the bill is that I would like to open up the coal mines. I would like to open up all of the interior of that great empire that belongs to this country and which has been unappreciated by the people of this country all these years. [Applause.] I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this bill will pass as it was originally introduced, as it passed the Senate, and as it was approved once before by the Committee on Territories. We have done little enough for Alaska—when they have a chance don't block the way. Give them a fair show. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this bill came before the Committee on Public Lands, without a single member, so far as I know, knowing a blessed thing in the world about it. We considered it at our last meeting of the committee. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] knew anything about it, we got very little or no information from him. There was no one except the very gentlemanly and able lawyer who came before us to explain it. We gave some relief to this road it wanted. We extended a limit for them to do certain things three years. We also extended another limit that was about to expire. This was satisfactory; and then we got down to the second section, and they proposed then to take great river fronts, without our knowing anything about the value of those river fronts, without anyone before us to tell the committee the value of these lands. They were anxious to build the road. We wondered why it was that they were so anxious to build the road. Yet it is said that these water fronts are valueless. The statements of the gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH] gave us some light on the subject. His information and common sense suggested to us to save these river fronts for the people who some day may go and build the cities about these railroad stations and river fronts.

Mr. LACEY. Let me ask my friend a question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Iowa has had and has all the time that he wants. I am going to stand by what we agreed in the committee to do. We cut this lake front matter out. The gentleman's committee did it and did it conscientiously and as intelligently as we could. I am going to stand by that. I am going to stand by the river fronts. I am going to stand by the Government's rights. If it is a good thing for the railroad, it is a good thing for the Government not to give it to the railroads—that is, all of it at any one place, at least. The bill gives this road 160 acres of land, not in a lump, but in such a way as that this road can take miles of land up the river and miles of it down the river and thus make out its 160 acres and control the whole water front. They can make it 6 feet wide along the river front for miles and thus deprive the people who go there from ever getting to use the front of these waters. We cut that out, and we cut out a similar provision respecting the water front at some other places. They say that the land up there is worth a dollar and a half. Section 3 gives them the right to buy this land at any time for a dollar and a quarter. We struck that out, because we did not know what the value of the land was. We don't know whether it is gold or silver or copper. We had no light on the subject, and as faithful members of the gentleman's committee we tried to preserve the Government's right and yet help this road. The gentleman brought up this bill when he knew that we knew nothing about it; we amended it and now he is coming into the House with this great strong rule, running roughshod over the recommendations of his committee when we stood by him in the committee in our efforts at least to protect the Government and the rights of the people. [Applause.]

I will never turn tail and run from my committee recommendations. [Applause.] What else, Mr. Speaker? We gave the road an exemption from taxation for a few years, a thing I did not want to vote for, but did so under the circumstances. The road's representatives said the Government had given such an exemption to other Alaska railroads. Here are young men trying to build a railroad. I said to the splendid young railroad lawyer: "I want to help you, but when I help you I want also to protect the public; I want to protect the people who are to go out to this country and help to build it up, but I do not want you to swallow everything in the country." [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am about to move to take a recess until 8 o'clock, and, if the House will indulge me, to say this: It is necessary that every Member be present at that time, and the more prompt they are in attendance the sooner we will get through with the business of the House and the session, so as to close up.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to inquire, before that motion is made, how the time remains?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa has four minutes and the gentleman from Missouri two.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 1 minute) the House took a recess until 8 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call from the Speaker's table the bill S. 6209, and ask for the present consideration of the same.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 6209) authorizing certain changes in the permanent system of highways in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commisisoners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to prepare a new highway plan for that portion of the District of Columbia lying north of Ordway street, south of Rodman street, east of Reno road, and west of Connecticut Avenue Highlands subdivision, under the provisions contained in the act of Congress approved March 2, 1893, entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," and an amendment to said act approved June 28, 1898; that upon the completion and recording of said new highway plan it shall take the place of and stand for any previous plan for said portion of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to consider the bill at this time. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), of the 29th instant, I return herewith House bill No. 18901, entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to John E. English."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 29, 1906.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the message will be referred to the Committee on Pensions. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18537) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 17714. An act to authorize the commencement and conduct of legal proceedings under the direction of the Attorney-General; and

H. R. 20407. An act to authorize the Baldwin and Dague Lumber Company to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River in Arkansas.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), that the President be requested to return the bill (H. R. 19047) entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to Susan C. Smith."

JAMES M. PICKRELL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SOUTHALL] calls from the Calendar Senate bill 1812 under the general order that was adopted touching the Private Calendar on yesterday or the day before. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1812) for the relief of Lieut. James M. Pickrell, United States Navy, retired.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Lieut. James M. Pickrell, United States Navy, retired, a lieutenant-commander on the retired list of the Navy, with the pay commensurate with the length of service rendered by said officer in the Navy, and to date from the time of such appointment to the grade of lieutenant-commander on the retired list.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear some explanation of this bill. What is the reason for it?

Mr. SOUTHALL. Mr. Speaker, it is a bill promoting Lieutenant Pickrell to lieutenant-commander. At the time he was retired he was ordered to report so as to be promoted. His health was found to be in such condition that he was retired and the Committee on Naval Affairs report, on account of his efficient services, he should be promoted, he on one occasion, while commander of a ship, being the last man who left the ship. He stayed on it until everybody got off the ship, and the ship sank. The Department says there is no objection to his being promoted.

Mr. PAYNE. The reason was he was too ill at the time——

Mr. SOUTHALL. It is all right. The committee passed it to-day. It passed the Senate unanimously, and the committee passed it to-day.

Mr. LAMB. I have looked into the report, and it is all right.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the report read in this case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the report of the House committee has not been printed. The bill has been reported, and presumably the report has been sent to the Printing Office.

Mr. LAMB. The Senate committee united in recommending this.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances, I will not insist upon the report being read.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, it was read the third time, and passed. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to bills of the following titles:

S. 218. An act granting to the City of Durango, in the State of Colorado, certain lands therein described for water reservoirs; and

S. 4774. An act relating to the movements and anchorage of vessels in Hampton Roads, the harbors of Norfolk and Newport News and adjacent waters, in the State of Virginia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 2969) to authorize the Attorney-General and certain other officers of the Department of Justice and special assistants and counsel to begin and conduct legal proceedings in any courts of the United States and before any commission or commissioner or quasi judicial body created under the laws of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Joint resolution (S. R. 72) fixing the date upon which the act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, approved June ——, 1906, shall go into effect.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 1476. An act granting certain lands to the town of Tincup, Colo., for cemetery purposes;

S. 4298. An act to amend section 4471 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, regulation of steam vessels; and

S. 6167. An act to improve the channels along the New Jersey coast.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12987. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and

H. R. 17714. An act to authorize the commencement and conduct of legal proceedings under the direction of the Attorney-General.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 6176. An act providing for pay of expenses of district judges—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the concurrent resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20403) making appropriations to supply deficiencies, is hereby authorized and empowered to insert in said bill and embrace in their agreement all necessary appropriations to carry into effect the authorizations which shall finally be authorized in the bill (H. R. 20410) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes; also the additional amount necessary, under the Interstate Commerce Commission, required by the act H. R. 12987, commonly known as the "railroad rate bill."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I think there ought to be a proviso that the public buildings bill should pass.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is, of course, in the resolution, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The question was taken; and the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested to cause an inquiry to be made, and report to the House at the next regular session of Congress as follows:

First. How much floor space available for office purposes would be gained in buildings owned by the United States and occupied by the Executive Departments and other Government establishments at Washington, if there should be removed therefrom all records and files not necessary for daily or current reference by said Departments or establishments and have the same stored in a suitably constructed building for such purposes; and Second. What buildings are rented in Washington for purposes of storage of files or records of the Government that could be relinquished if a suitable building for storage of records were constructed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to add an amendment to the resolution. I observe there is an omission. The amendment is as follows:

And the amount of rent which the Government is now paying therefor.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question was taken; and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

THE SILETZ POWER AND MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 12080) granting to the Siletz Manufacturing Company a right of way for a water ditch or canal through the Siletz Indian Reservation, in Oregon, with Senate amendments.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to nonconcur in the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman explain what bill this is?

Mr. LACEY. It is the Siletz Indian bill, granting a right of way for a water ditch or canal through the Siletz Indian Reservation. I have not had time to examine the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. STEPHENS of Texas.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Building and Grounds be, and he is hereby, directed to submit to the House, at the next session, plans and estimates of cost and a report upon changes necessary to be made in remodeling the Hall of Representatives, with a view of facilitating the business of the House, by the removal of desks from the Hall and the substitution of benches or chairs therefor, and by providing for the membership of the House writing rooms and more spacious retiring rooms.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I reserve the right to object. I will withdraw my objection provided that the mover of the resolution will insert a clause in substance as follows:

Or to adopt some other method thought by the committee to be best.

The idea I have in my head is this: That the best acoustical arrangement to be seen in the civilized world is now at the tabernacle at Salt Lake City, and I believe that a committee ought to be sent to Salt Lake City. [Laughter.] Notwithstanding the smiles of the gentlemen [laughter], I believe they ought to adopt the measurements of that building as nearly as possible, and reproduce it here in this House, so that gentlemen can stand up and be heard. Very much of the imperfection of the legislation which we enact here grows out of our inability to hear one another.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please suspend. The gentleman from New York has a conference report.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I shall finish in a moment. This resolution seems to confine the proposition to plans that have already been adopted by the British House of Commons, and I only wish that we may consider a method by which we will secure a more efficient hall for the transaction of the public business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I object.

Mr. BURLESON. I will say that I received an assurance from the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that he would not object.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York presents a conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18537) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June thirtieth, nineteen hundred and seven, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 29, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount proposed in said amendment insert "$837,200;"

And on page 10 of the bill, in line 21, after the word "Industry," strike out all down to and including the word "also," in line 9, page 11, and insert in lieu thereof the word "and;"

And on page 11 of the bill strike out all after the word "named," in line 20, down to and including the word "inspection," in line 23 of page 11;

And on page 12, line 24 of the bill, after the word "Industry," insert the words "for purposes other than meat inspection;"

And on page 13, after the word "certified," in lines 22 and 23 of the bill, strike out all down to and including the word "further," in line 1, page 14, and insert in lieu thereof the word "Provided;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 153: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 153, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount proposed in said amendment insert "$9,932,940;" and the Senate agree to the same.

J. W. WADSWORTH,
CHAS. F. SCOTT,
JOHN LAMB,
Managers on the part of the House.

REDFIELD PROCTOR,
H. C. HANSBROUGH,
F. M. SIMMONS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT TO ACCOMPANY FINAL CONFERENCE REPORT ON THE AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate recedes, and agrees to the House substitute for the Senate meat-inspection bill.

Amendments 24, 30, 147, and 153 relate simply to change in verbiage and change of totals, made necessary by the adoption by the Senate of the House substitute to Senate amendment No. 29.

J. W. WADSWORTH.
CHAS. SCOTT.
JOHN LAMB.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

PROF. J. A. HOLMES.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD—I should like to have the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—a letter from Prof. J. A. Holmes, of the United States Geological Survey, directed to myself, and a copy of a letter from the same gentleman to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and a copy of a letter from Mr. Emil Swensson, a civil engineer, to Hon. JOHN DALZELL, and a copy of a letter from Mr. Richard L. Humphrey, a civil engineer, to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, all of which are in reply to and in explanation of certain statements made to the House on June 13 by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to print the matter referred to in the RECORD.

Mr. MADDEN. I reserve the right to object until the gentleman tells us what is contained in these letters.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I shall be glad to have the letters read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to know what they are about; that is all.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, the letters which the gentleman asks to have printed in the RECORD are letters from Mr. Holmes, of the Geological Survey, addressed to me, concerning a statement made by myself on the floor during the consideration of the sundry civil bill, in which statement I asserted that a certain letter presented at the hearings had been emasculated by the omission of a certain paragraph after the transcript of his testimony, with the letter, had been sent to him and before the letter had been returned for printing. I have no objection whatever to the printing of a copy of the letter from the gentleman or the copy of the letter from the gentleman from Philadelphia, to whom reference has been made. I have printed Mr. Holmes's letter as it was originally submitted. I have also arranged to have printed in the permanent RECORD a lithographic copy of the letter as it was changed from the time it left the committee until it was returned by the officer of the Geological Survey, Mr. Holmes, or whoever returned it.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, in reply to that, I wish to state that Mr. Holmes has seen this printed sheet to which the gentleman from Minnesota refers, and states to me—and the statement may be repeated in his letter—that it is not in his handwriting; that he did not make a line or a dot upon it. I admit that from the matter as it appeared to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, he drew exactly the inference from the facts that I would have drawn under the circumstances; but I think, with Professor Holmes's statement, his high reputation, and the fact, as he asserts, that it is not in his handwriting and that he did not touch it, the whole matter is concluded by saying that no suspicion can rest upon Professor Holmes in the matter.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN subsequently said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to renew my request for unanimous consent that the letters which I have heretofore mentioned be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. TAWNEY. I hope there will be no objection to the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman renews his request for the printing of the letters in reference to Professor Holmes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Washington, D. C., June 29, 1906.

The Hon. W. W. KITCHIN, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 13, 1906, page 8683, the Hon. JAMES A. TAWNEY, chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House, stated during the debate on the sundry civil bill that I emasculated a letter which had been signed by me and which was a part of the records of the Appropriations Committee by having caused to be omitted in the printing of this letter a portion of a paragraph.

Concerning this statement, I wish to say that I made no change whatever in the letter referred to; that I had no knowledge of the fact that any change in the letter had been made until the above statement was made by Mr. TAWNEY; that there was no reason why I should desire that such a change as he refers to be made, but, on the contrary, there was abundant reason besides that of common honesty why I should not wish any change made in that letter, for within a few days after my statement was submitted to the subcommittee on the sundry civil bill I gave copies of the letter referred to, in its original form, to Representative BURLESON, of Texas, Representative PAGE, of North Carolina, and showed copies of this letter, in its original form, to Representatives DIXON, of Montana, and SMALL, of North Carolina, and other Members of the House, giving these gentlemen to understand that the letter would appear in the records in this original form. Furthermore, on page 616 of the hearings before the subcommittee the supposedly objectionable feature of the letter, and which was contained in the omitted paragraph, is reproduced in a question by Mr. SMITH, of the subcommittee.

I have no knowledge whatever as to how the change referred to could have been made.

On the same page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD Mr. TAWNEY refers to another letter written by some one to Mr. Emil Swensson, an engineer of national reputation at Pittsburg, Pa., asking Mr. Swensson to write to the Representatives from Pittsburg in Congress urging their support of the appropriation for the investigation of structural materials. This letter was printed on page 615 of the hearings before the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee on the sundry civil bill. It was shown to me at the time of my appearance before the committee, and I then stated that I had not written the letter, nor had I any knowledge that such a letter had been written or as to who had written it. Furthermore, on May 5 following I wrote to Mr. TAWNEY on this subject, inclosing a copy of a second letter from Mr. Swensson to Representative DALZELL, in which Mr. Swensson states that I was not the writer of the letter; and I asked that my statement of that date, together with this letter from Mr. Swensson of April 26 be incorporated in the record of the committee's hearings.

Not only was this request not granted, but, as indicated by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 13, 1906 (p. 8683), Mr. TAWNEY ignores this letter, and, notwithstanding my denial, repeats the statement that the letter was written by me.

I did not know who was the author of the letter to Mr. Swensson, referred to in his letter to Mr. DALZELL of April 16, until on June 25 I was informed by Mr. Richard L. Humphrey, who is the secretary of the joint committee of engineers on concrete and reenforced concrete, and who was appointed by this committee of engineers as their representative to look after this appropriation, that he was the author of that letter; and on the day following Mr. Humphrey forwarded to me from Philadelphia a copy of the attached letter of June 26, which he had written to Mr. TAWNEY, and in which he clears up that point.

In his statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as referred to above, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee has done me a gross injustice—one which I feel sure he himself will correct when his attention is called to the facts in the case.

If you deem it proper, I shall be glad to have the attached papers printed in the RECORD along with this letter.

Very respectfully,

J. A. HOLMES.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Washington, D. C., May 5, 1906.

Hon. JAMES A. TAWNEY,
Chairman Appropriations Committee,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: Referring again to the letter from Mr. Swensson, presented at a recent hearing before the subcommittee on the sundry civil bill, and relating to the investigations of structural materials, I beg to report that I have inquired concerning this matter from every person now on the pay roll of the Geological Survey in connection with this work, and no one of them either wrote or suggested such a letter or knew that such a letter had been written until my attention was called to the matter at the hearing. Mr. Swensson himself has confirmed this statement through the same channel that brought his original letter to you.

Concerning the other letter referred to at the same hearing, that signed by me and sent to certain mining engineers, I trust that, while now admitting this letter to be capable of a double interpretation, I may be permitted to express my surprise and regret that my motive in writing it seems to have been misunderstood.

These mining engineers are my professional associates and had been inquiring as to how they coud obtain copies of these reports. They were interested especially in two phases of our work, the lessening of the waste in our fuel resources and the lessening of the loss of life by greater efficiency and safety in mining operations; and the few letters which they may have written to Members of Congress would naturally have been along these lines. For twenty years I have been accustomed to write Members of Congress for Government reports; and during my one year's official connection with the Government work at St. Louis I had not learned that there was a better way. This work is new, and I felt that some expression of opinion from outside competent judges as to the wisdom of continuing it would be appreciated. I knew from the character of the men that if they wrote at all the opinion expressed would be just the same, whether they wrote in response to a suggestion from me or one from any other source.

The agitation in behalf of the enlargement of the investigation of structural materials has come from the several thousand civil engineers who are engaged in construction work in all parts of the country, and who feel most keenly the need of additional knowledge concerning these materials. I have neither written nor caused to be written any letters to these engineers in connection with this appropriation, nor have I in other ways encouraged them to write Members of Congress.

The agitation in behalf of the continuance of the fuel investigations has come mainly from the mechanical engineers and the users of fuel, or the manufacturers, in different parts of the country, who have felt that the existing terrible waste in the mining and use of the fuel resources of the country had come to be a matter of national concern. They also have acted in this matter on their own initiative. More than a year ago the American Society of Mechanical Engineers, without the knowledge or suggestion of any person associated with this work, passed a resolution at its annual meeting asking its members to cooperate in securing the continuance of these investigations as a means of preventing the enormous waste of the country's fuel supplies.

It is not unlikely that I am being credited with a considerable amount of agitation in this connection for which I am neither directly nor indirectly responsible; and I beg to submit this statement for your consideration, and for insertion in the hearing.[a]

Very respectfully,

J. A. HOLMES.

[See hearing, sundry civil, p. 615.]

APRIL 26, 1906.

Hon. JOHN DALZELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to my letter of the 16th instant to you, relative to the appropriation for the investigation of structural materials, I find that I made a mistake in stating that the letter to me on this subject was from the person in charge of the laboratory, who I have learned is Mr. J. A. Holmes. He was not the writer of the letter, but one of the members of one of the committees appointed by one of the engineers' societies, who is appointed to keep in touch with the investigations made at the St. Louis laboratory on structural materials, was the writer of the letter. Thus he is not in charge of the laboratory, but simply represents the engineers' societies in the matter, which I erroneously designated as being "in charge." However, this does not in any way affect the importance of this subject and its investigation and in no way lessens my interest in this important work, and I trust that the full appropriation asked for will be granted by the committee and by Congress, as these investigations are of such great importance and are urgently needed by the country at large.[b]

Yours, very respectfully,

EMIL SWENSSON.

[See hearing, sundry civil, p. 615.]

PHILADELPHIA, PA., June 26, 1906.

Hon. JAMES A. TAWNEY,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Returning from San Francisco, where I have been during the past six weeks, representing the committee of engineers on the investigation of the effect of the earthquake and fire on materials and systems of construction, I write to express the hope that the appropriation for the investigation of structural materials by the Government, which the engineers have so earnestly advocated, has been duly incorporated in the sundry civil bill and will be passed by the House of Representatives at this session.

The result of the earthquake and fire in San Francisco have served to still further illustrate the great need for such investigations in order to furnish a better and more accurate knowledge of the strength and supposed fireproofing qualities of many structural materials.

In looking over the account of the debate on this appropriation in the House of Representatives, I regret to see that, on page 8683 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 13, you attribute to Mr. Holmes the authorship of a letter to Mr. Emil Swensson, of Pittsburg, relative to this appropriation. As I stated to your committee, I have been delegated by the joint committee on concrete and reenforced concrete to look after the appropriation for the continuance of the work on this subject by the United States Geological Survey, and in that capacity wrote the letter in question to Mr. Swensson, a fellow-member of this committee. Mr. Holmes was not either directly or indirectly responsible for it, nor did he know anything about it.

Thanking you and the members of your subcommittee for the patience and fairness with which you heard the statements of the different engineers in behalf of this appropriation, I beg to remain,

Yours, very truly,

RICHARD L. HUMPHREY,
Secretary Engineers' Joint Committee on Concrete, etc.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Washington, D. C., March 12, 1906.

DEAR SIR: The United States Senate recently passed a resolution asking the Secretary of the Interior for an expression of opinion concerning the continuance of the investigations of fuels and structural materials by the United States Geological Survey.

I am sending you herewith a copy of his report in response to this resolution, in which he recommends the continuance of these investigations, giving reasons therefor, and asks Congress to make an appropriation of $350,000 for this work during the next fiscal year.

The final report on the fuel investigations during 1904 is now ready for distribution (Professional Paper No. 48), and you can obtain free of charge a copy of this report by applying for it at once to some Member of Congress, or the Director of the Geological Survey. If in writing for this report you feel sufficiently interested in this work to express an opinion as to its continuance, I am sure that any such expression of opinion on your part will be considered appropriate.

The report on the investigation of structural materials during the past year, and also the preliminary report on the fuel investigations during 1905, will also be published at some time in the near future, and copies of these reports should be applied for through the same channels.

I may add that these fuel and structural material investigations will hereafter be conducted under an advisory board made up of representatives from the national engineering and allied societies, and on this board the mining engineers will have five representatives, Mr. John Hays Hammond, of New York; Mr. Robert W. Hunt, of Chicago; Mr. B. F. Bush, of St. Louis; Mr. Julian Kennedy, of Pittsburg, and Mr. C. S. Robinson, of Denver.

Very respectfully, J. A. HOLMES.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois to let the man who is accused have an opportunity to put in his own defense.

Mr. TAWNEY. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his objection.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

HARRY A. YOUNG.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 15673) for the relief of Harry A. Young, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understood a few minutes ago that we adopted a conference report on the agricultural bill. As I understood the message from the Senate read just now, it has just arrived.

The SPEAKER. That was a notification that the Senate had agreed to the conference report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It agreed to the same report that we did?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The House agreed when it had the papers, and then they went to the Senate. The gentleman from Iowa demands the regular order.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman from Missouri has two minutes remaining, and I would like to have him consume it.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I realize that I am making a futile effort. This is understood to be the last day of this session of Congress, and there is a great deal of work to do. At the hour of 6 o'clock this evening, on the motion, I believe of the Speaker himself, all business was suspended and a recess taken until 8 o'clock to-night in order that gentlemen interested in passing and rushing this legislation to a consummation might gather upon this floor in sufficient numbers to pass this bill.

Gentlemen have told us that the measure under consideration conveys no great or valuable privileges to the railroad company, and yet the fact is that it contains enough of value to draw men clear across the continent from the ice-bound shores of Alaska, and a coterie of lawyers from the great cities of the country. Not only that, but there is value enough in it to engage the attention of the Committee on Rules in this House, of which the Speaker is a member, and not only that, but to engage the cordial and hearty support of the chairman of one of the great committees of this House who, apparently, has no interest in this matter, and who, so far as we know, knows nothing about it, and also to engage the valiant services of my estimable friend the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands. Tell me that this bill is of no significance! Tell me that it is of no value to the railroad companies! Why not accept the suggestion made by myself and others and let this matter go over to the next session, when we can and will freely give them every consideration which their measure demands? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is entitled to four minutes.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, if gentlemen will notice this map they will see that there are 25,000 miles of seacoast of Alaska. When the right-of-way act of 1898 was drawn, and I drew it myself, there was no railroad in Alaska, and we agreed to reserve every other quarter of a mile of the whole 25,000 miles of shore. It turns out that one-quarter of a mile of this reservation lies in the middle of the depot grounds and yards of this railroad along the shore, and the opposition is wholly, or mainly, because they object to their taking that little tract of land a quarter of a mile wide and half a mile deep in the center of their land. That is practically all this complaint is about. There are other points of much greater importance in the bill, but gentlemen seem to be most concerned about this item.

The Committee on Public Lands reported this bill, or, rather, one like it, in the last Congress. It was not reported until the latter end of the last session, and was not reached. In the present Congress the same bill was introduced and referred to the Territorial Committee, and they reported it favorably.

The Senate bill afterwards came over and was sent to the Committee on Public Lands, where it properly belongs. Of course there were some little things in it, like exemption from taxation, that might have carried it properly to the Committee on Territories. It could have gone to either committee. I was not disposed to insist in the committee on the provision that they have a quarter of a section for each hundred miles in view of the fact that a small majority was against this proposition. But when to-day we passed a bill for another company, to give them 2,560 acres of land for ocean terminal under like circumstances, I felt that it would be wrong for us to strike out the 80 acres of land from this bill, refusing it to this company that had spent nearly $3,000,000 in constructing a railroad.

The company has proved its good faith by heavy expenditures, and the people of Alaska greatly need railways. I ask this House to vote down the committee amendments and pass this bill. It is a Senate bill, and it will at once become a law. If amended, it must go to conference and not likely become a law at this session.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Unanimously reported?

Mr. LACEY. No; it is not. There are two members of the committee who sign a minority report against the bill. It had the unanimous report, however, from the Committee on Territories, so that two committees have examined it. It is a very modest request, and I hope every man in the House will vote against the amendments and to pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the amendments were rejected.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some confusion as to what we are voting on. It is all by rule and we can not keep up with these rules. Will the Chair please state the parliamentary situation?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not speak in a whispering voice. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER. I understood the language of the Chair, but will the Chair kindly define the proposition we are voting on?

The SPEAKER. The House has already voted on the proposition, and the amendments seem to have been rejected.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the House clearly has not understood the parliamentary situation.

The SPEAKER. That is not the fault of the Chair.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a vote to approve the amendments and the bill is a vote against the position of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know what the position of the gentleman from Iowa is.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the Chair please state the parliamentary situation?

The SPEAKER. It is not the business of the Chair to know the position of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY]. The vote was on agreeing to the amendments recommended by the committee.

Mr. RUCKER. By the House committee.

The SPEAKER. By the Committee on Public Lands; and the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. RUCKER. I call for a division.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 153.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands tellers. As many as are in favor of taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Twenty-five gentlemen have arisen; not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused. The noes have it, and the amendments are rejected. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RUCKER) there were—ayes 154, noes 47.

So the bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time.

During the third reading of the bill,

Mr. RUCKER rose and said: Mr. Speaker——

After the bill had been read the third time,

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know if I can attract the attention of the Chair at this time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not notice the gentleman and did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER. I am now begging the Chair to give me notice after a while.

The SPEAKER. It does not require any begging. The gentleman is entitled to recognition.

Mr. RUCKER. The Chair did not give it to me, I desire to say.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri demands the yeas and nays. As many as are in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-six gentlemen have arisen; not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused. The ayes have it, and the bill is passed.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider and to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. RUCKER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to reconsider the last vote and to lay that motion on the table.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

BEET-SUGAR INDUSTRY.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following substitute concurrent resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution 37.

Resolved That there be printed 12,000 copies of the Report on the Progress of the Beet-Sugar Industry in the United States in 1905, 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 8,000 copies for the use of the Department of Agriculture; and that the Secretary of Agriculture be authorized to print and distribute annually hereafter 8,000 copies of such annual reports covering the progress of the beet-sugar industry; Provided, That the preparation and publication of such annual reports shall be within the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution just reported?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana two or three questions. How many copies of this report is it that the gentleman wants to have printed?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I want 12,000 copies printed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What are you going to do with them?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. They are for distribution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I could not hear what the Clerk read. How are they to be distributed?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. A thousand will be placed to the credit of the Senate and 3,000 to the credit of the House and 8,000 to the credit of the Department of Agriculture, and hereafter 8,000 copies will be printed annually at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture. I would say to the gentleman from Missouri that heretofore each year the committee has authorized the printing of 20,000 to 60,000 copies of this report, and by reason of the faulty distribution very few of these reports have been sent out through the country.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why have you given 8,000 to the Secretary of Agriculture and only 3,000 to the House and 1,000 to the Senate?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Simply for this reason: That experience has shown that the quotas placed to the credit of Members of the House and Senate heretofore have gone undistributed, and have wasted and rotted in the basement of the Capitol.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I thought Members distributed all they could get and wanted more documents to distribute.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that the Secretary of Agriculture has not had a sufficient number to supply the demands made on the Department, and this will cover requests made of the Secretary and relieve Members of Congress of the accumulation that has been going on in years gone by.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What makes you say after this year the Members of the House and Senate will not get any?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Because we provide by this substitute——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In this resolution here now?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I am opposed to it, then. I will not object to the unanimous consent.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri I sincerely hope he will not object to this publication.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will not object to your unanimous consent.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether he considers it proper that the Secretary of Agriculture should have the distribution of the larger number of documents referred to in the resolution? I put that inquiry for this reason: The Department of Agriculture, or some subordinate of that Department, has not been fair to certain Members of this House in the distribution of documents. Frequently when documents very much needed by Members were called for by such Members the answer was returned that the documents were no longer available for distribution. When the Department officials are questioned as to why there is not a sufficient supply on hand, the answer comes that the press has been told, and that the press has published that the particular document was about to be issued, and that in consequence of the press announcement, made in advance of giving notice of the issuance of the bulletin to Members of this House, the demand for the document was so great that Members could no longer obtain copies. [Applause.]

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say to the gentleman from New York I never heard of any complaints of that nature.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I had a communication the other day, or rather I talked over the phone in regard to such a complaint, and I know that Members of this House have suffered just in the manner to which I have referred. I am opposed to a system that gives to a subordinate of a Department the right to distribute documents that ought to be under the control of Members of this House and the Senate. [Applause.]

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say to the gentleman from New York, I never heard anyone yet complain because he had not been able to secure this particular publication. I think that before almost any publication this is one that should be placed——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I will answer the gentleman from Indiana thus: There was a certain popular bulletin issued. Notice of the issuance of that bulletin was sent to the Members of the House. When I sent to the Department for a number of the bulletins the answer came that the supply was exhausted. I inquired of the Department, or rather of the publication bureau, why it was that the supply was exhausted before or at about the time notices were sent out by the Department, and an answer came back that the Department or bureau had let it go out to the press that such bulletin was to be issued, and that because of such notice to the public the bulletins had been distributed in such numbers that Members applying for this much-wanted bulletin could not obtain it for their constituents. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

DIGEST OF CUSTOMS LAWS AND DECISIONS.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to purchase from the legal owners thereof, at a cost not to exceed $2,000, payable out of any funds not otherwise appropriated, the manuscript of a digest of the United States customs laws and decisions, compiled by Robert M. Cousar, deceased, and to have printed, with such revision as in his judgment may be necessary, not to exceed 1,000 copies for the official use of the Treasury Department. And the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for said purpose. And the superintendent of documents is hereby authorized to reprint this document for sale at $2 per copy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

RIVER AND HARBOR REPORTS.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution No. 103, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That at any time prior to the assembling of Congress in December, 1906, all reports of preliminary examinations and surveys ordered in the river and harbor act of March 3, 1905, that may be ready for printing shall, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be printed by the Public Printer as documents of the Fifty-ninth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

EMPLOYEES OF GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4673) to provide for the allowance and payment of the employees of the Government Printing Office of the same leave of absence which is allowed to the clerks and employees of the Executive Departments of the Government.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the date of the passage of this act the thirty days' annual leave of absence with pay in any one year to employees of the Government Printing Office, authorized by the existing law, shall be exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays: Provided, That the existing laws relating to the granting of annual leave with pay to clerks and employees in the Executive Departments shall apply to clerks and employees of the Government Printing Office who are paid annual or monthly salaries or compensation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, we can not hear what the resolution is.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to hear the resolution again read.

Mr. KEIFER. We will have to have order, so that we can hear it.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be again read.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I would say in support of this measure and pending the objection of the gentleman from New York, that when the bill was passed providing for leave of absence in the Government Printing Office——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If this bill is passed, is not all that it does this, that it puts the employees of the Government Printing Office upon exactly the same basis as the employees of the larger Executive Departments?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. That is exactly what the bill does, and I will say to the House that when this law was enacted it was undoubtedly contemplated that the employees of the Government Printing Office could be given thirty days' leave of absence, exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays. That is the construction that has been placed upon the law applying to the various Executive Departments, and the law as it was passed applying to the Government Printing Office was by one Comptroller of the Treasury so interpreted as to exclude Sundays and legal holidays. And the effect of this law will be simply to place the employees of the Government Printing Office on the same basis. I would say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and to the House that there are no more faithful employees in the service of the Government than the employees of the Government Printing Office. [Applause.] They work one hour longer than the clerks in the Executive Departments. They get no sick leave. Their annual leave is twenty-six days, as now construed, as against thirty days to the clerks in the Departments. It is no more than fair, it is an act of simple justice, to place these employees upon the same basis as the employees in the Departments.

Mr. PAYNE. I will ask the gentleman, how much leave of absence do the employees of the navy-yard get?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I do not know.

Mr. TAWNEY. Fifteen days.

Mr. PAYNE. They get fifteen days.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. The clerks in the Navy Department get thirty days, exclusive of Sundays and holidays.

Mr. PAYNE. The navy-yard employees get fifteen days.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say to the gentleman from New York that if the employees in the navy-yard get only fifteen days' leave of absence, then I am in favor of giving them thirty days' leave of absence, as is given the clerks in the Executive Departments of the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Notwithstanding the applause of gentlemen who are interested in people in the Departments, I have the courage to say that we should level the other way, and we should reduce the thirty days in the Departments and put it on the same level as the employees of the Government Printing Office—twenty-six days—instead of raising the navy-yard and all the other Departments to thirty days.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say to the gentleman from New York that I think until that action is taken the employees in the Government Printing Office, who work longer and, I believe, work harder and get less money than any other employees in any Department of the Government, should get thirty days annual leave.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman yield to me a couple of minutes?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has asked unanimous consent for present consideration of a bill. The gentleman, by unanimous consent, can open a debate on this bill, if he chooses, before unanimous consent is given for its consideration.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word.

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose the whole thing is to get me to withdraw my objection. I insist on the objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. GRIGGS. For the purpose of inquiring if it is now in order to move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS]?

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; it is not in order.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution fixing the time when the rate bill shall go into effect.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the following Senate joint resolution, and to consider it at this time. The Clerk will read.

The joint resolution (S. R. 72) fixing the date upon which the act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, approved June ——, 1906, shall go into effect, was read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Michigan that for the present he withhold that request until the resolution has been examined with some care.

RETURN OF A BILL TO THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following request from the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 2969) to authorize the Attorney-General and certain other officers of the Department of Justice and special assistants and counsel to begin and conduct legal proceedings in any courts of the United States and before any commissioner or commissioners or quasi judicial body created under the laws of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WATSON). Without objection, the Committee on the Judiciary will be discharged from further consideration of the bill referred to and the bill returned to the Senate. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had receded from its amendments to the bill (H. R. 12080) granting to the Siletz Power and Manufacturing Company a right of way for a water ditch or canal through the Siletz Indian Reservation, in Oregon.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

House concurrent resolution.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20403) making appropriations to supply deficiencies is hereby authorized and empowered to insist on said bill and embrace in their agreement all necessary appropriations to carry into effect the authorizations which shall finally be authorized in the bill (H. R. 20410) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes; also the additional amount necessary, under the Interstate Commerce Commission, required by the act H. R. 12987, commonly known as the "railroad-rate bill."

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17842) granting a pension to Josephine V. Sparks.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House joint resolution 186, relative to the printing of 12,000 copies of the report on the progress of the beet-sugar industry.

BEET-SUGAR INDUSTRY.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. So that the beet-sugar men may obtain the documents that they are interested in, I now withdraw the objection I made to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS].

The SPEAKER. That request is not pending.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present a joint resolution in lieu of House concurrent resolution 37.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following joint resolution, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The title of the joint resolution, in lieu of House concurrent resolution 37, relative to the printing of 12,000 copies of the Report of the Progress of the Beet-Sugar Industry, was read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. This joint resolution has already been read once. Is there objection to its present consideration?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

WATER RESERVOIRS, DURANGO, COLO.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill S. 2188.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2188) granting to the city of Durango, in the State of Colorado, certain lands therein described for water reservoirs, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House with an amendment as follows: Insert after the word "acre," in line 3 of the House amendment, after line 5, page 4, the following: "in five equal annual installments, the first of which shall be payable April 1, 1907, and title shall remain in the United States until final payment is made;" and agree to the same.

JOHN F. LACEY,
F. W. MONDELL,
JOHN L. BURNETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

THOS. H. CARTER,
A. J. MCLAURIN,
FRANK P. FLINT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement was read, as follows:

The effect of the amendment is to dispose of the land to the city of Durango, Colo., for a water supply, as provided in the original House bill, excepting to give the city the right to pay for the same in five annual installments instead of for cash in advance.

JOHN F. LACEY,
F. W. MONDELL,
JOHN L. BURNETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the conference report.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

CUSTOMS COLLECTION DISTRICTS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 14606—a bill to provide for the consolidation and reorganization of customs collection districts, and for other purposes; and I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. I would state my only object is to allow time for general debate, and that the gentleman from West Virginia will first take the floor upon that bill. I wish to say that I do not propose to ask the House to vote upon it at all during the balance of this session. I expect to call it up at the next session and pass it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to consider now in the House, as in Committee of the Whole House, for the purpose of general debate only, the bill of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14606) to provide for the consolidation and reorganization of customs collection districts, and for other purposes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that it is just to take up this bill for the purpose of giving an opportunity for general debate. I believe that is a very good idea.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again state. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to consider the bill, the title of which was just read to the House, as in Committee of the Whole House, for the purpose of general debate only at this session.

Mr. SULZER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if the time is to be equally divided between the two sides?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly; but I shall ask that Mr. GAINES of West Virginia be recognized first, because we are an hour in arrears.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This side is ahead of that side an hour. We have already had an hour more than they have.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FINLEY. Is it proposed to have a vote to-night?

Mr. PAYNE. It is not; nor during this session.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The Clerk will again report the title of the bill.

The title of the bill was again reported.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, we have been told with great frequency recently by our Democratic friends that unless we revise the tariff they would do it. If, Mr. Speaker, they really believed this they could not be induced to say it for fear that we should hear it and govern ourselves accordingly.

What, Mr. Speaker, is a proper time for a revision of the tariff? I take it that tariff law should not be revised until its revenue-producing features are unsatisfactory or unless the economic and business condition is unsatisfactory under it. It is not now claimed, although it was a year ago, that the Dingley tariff law is not satisfactory as a revenue producer. It is not claimed that there is any deficit in the Treasury. It is not now claimed, as some years ago, that the money of the country has been withdrawn from circulation. But everybody must admit that the Dingley tariff law has worked remarkably well in adjusting the revenues of the country to the needs of the Government. The question, therefore, that remains is whether the economic condition of the country is one that demands a change.

In considering this question, Mr. Speaker, I shall consider the matter in a comparative way. I shall consider whether the country was more or less prosperous under that system of economic law our Democratic friends would now enact if they had the power.

Mr. Speaker, shortly after the Democratic party had been four years in power, one of the leading Democratic newspapers stated that the loss to the people by reason of that Democratic Administration had been, in the shrinkage of farm values alone, greater than the bonded debt of the Union at the close of the civil war. I remember very well, Mr. Speaker, that that statement seemed so remarkable to me that if it had come from a Republican newspaper I should have, perhaps, passed it by, believing that partisanship had induced a wild and reckless statement not justified by the facts. But finding that it came from a Democratic newspaper, I determined to investigate it and see whether the actual facts bore out the statement. When our Democratic friends, Mr. Speaker, ask us to substitute their system for ours, when they ask to bring this country back again to the same policy that existed when the Democratic party was in power for the only time in half a century, it behooves us to look and see whether what they now offer us is any different from what they offered us at that time. The policy of the Democratic party differs in no material respect from that which they put in operation when Mr. Cleveland was President of the United States. It is the same old cry expressed in different ways by different Democrats, depending upon the particular section of the country they represent. And whether they present their opinions under the name of "tariff reform" or a "revenue tariff," which is free trade—whether they call it "tariff for revenue, with incidental protection," or under whatever name, it is the same old policy of reduction of the tariff, the same old abandonment of Republican policy of protection that they gave us from 1893 to 1897.

Let me call your attention again to that remarkable statement contained in a Democratic newspaper that the country had lost more by the shrinkage of farm values alone under the Administration of Grover Cleveland than the entire bonded debt of the United States at the close of the civil war. Let us see now whether the facts bear out that statement. I have taken from the Statistical Abstract of the United States a comparative statement for the years 1895 and 1905 of certain farm values. I find that in 1895 there were in the country nearly 16,000,000 horses, that they had a value of $576,000,000, or an average value of $29.99 a head. I find that in 1905 the number had increased more than 1,000,000, that the value had increased $700,000,000, and that the average value per head was $70.36. In other words, notwithstanding the increase in the number, the increase in the average value of these animals to the farmers of the country had been more than 100 per cent.

I find that in 1895 there were 2,300,000 mules in the country—and this ought to interest that distinguished Democrat from the State of Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who, if he had his way, would raze every custom house to the ground. Their total value was $111,000,000, and their average value was $47.54 a head. In 1905 the number had increased by more than half a million, and the value had increased $140,000,000, and the average value of each animal had increased to $87.11. In other words, the average value under Republican Administration has been more than double that under a Democratic Administration.

And so we may go on, Mr. Speaker, clear through the list. There is but one single exception that I have been able to find where the value of individual animals to the farmers of this country had not grown from 50 to 100 per cent. I shall give that one example out of fairness and because a pretty forcible argument for Republican policy may be drawn even from that example. That one exception is in the case of cattle. I find in 1896 there were 32,000,000 in the country; that their total value was $508,000,000; that their average value was $15.81. I find that in 1905 the total was 47,000,000, and the total number had increased to 746,000,000, and the price of the individual animal, the single animal, was almost exactly the same. I say that is the only place that I have ever found where the price of any farm product was the same under the two Administrations. But there is this remarkable fact to be observed in this connection: That whereas in 1896 there were only 32,000,000, the total number of animals had increased in 1906 to over 47,000,000, an increase of 50 per cent in number, and yet the value had been maintained.

I shall insert in my printed speech the figures in detail. I hold in my hand these figures, and I will recapitulate them. In 1896 the total value of farm animals in this country was $1,727,000,000. In 1906 the value was $3,675,000,000, an increase of nearly $2,000,000,000. Well might that Democratic newspaper say, after four years' Democratic rule, that the loss to the country by shrinkage of farm values had been a greater amount than the bonded debt of the United States at the close of the civil war.

The detailed comparative statement referred to is as follows:

Number and value of specified farm animals.

[From Statistical Abstract of the United States for 1905, p. 534.]

HORSES.

Year.	Number.	Value.	Average value per head.
1895	15,893,318	$576,730,580	$29.99

But if there should be any doubt about whether the inference might be accurately drawn from the figures I have given, let me give the total value for several Administrations. I find that for the four years of Harrison's Administration the total value of farm animals was more than $9,000,000,000, that for the four years of Cleveland's Administration following the total value was something over $7,000,000,000, and that the decrease in value was more than $2,320,000,000. Then I have compared in this instance the Democratic Administration with the Republican Administration which had preceded it. Let me now compare that same Administration with the Republican Administration which followed it. For the four years of McKinley's Administration the total value of farm animals was $9,125,000,000, almost a recovery of the Harrison value after four years of Clevelandism.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am very glad to get those statistics, but I want to call this to the gentleman's attention, as to the increased value of cattle and stock and so forth, that that is what you might call an enforced valuation to a large extent, because of the great demands brought about by the Spanish war for horses and mules and beef and everything that goes to carry on a successful war, in addition to the great demand for our stock to carry on the war in Africa by England and I think possibly that would have something to do with the inceased valuation.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, unless I am interrupted so often that I can not reach that part of my speech, I shall show the gentleman that that was not the reason; that the reason for the increase of value was because of the greater industrial prosperity in the country that enabled the people of this country to increase their demand for the products of the farm.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield a little further? Now, I know personally, and I take it the gentleman will remember, that all the old street-car mules around the country and the worn-out horses were sold to the Government for two or three prices, and most everything else the farmer had to sell went up two or three prices, because of this great military demand for the farmers' products.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. But, Mr. Speaker, there was no great demand created by those wars. The demand was created by the greater prosperity of the American people, by the fact that American manufactures had been set in motion, that the American farmer was able to purchase, that the American merchant had custom, and that the American workingman, above all, had been transformed by better wages into an active consumer of products. It was an incident of the general prosperity, and that general prosperity an incident of the success of the Republican party in the country. [Applause on the Republican side.] A comparison, as I said a moment ago, of the McKinley Administration with that of Cleveland shows that the value of farm animals alone in the country was $1,751,000,000 more for the Republican Administration; but it takes some time, Mr. Speaker, to recover values in the matter of farm animals. During the Administration of Grover Cleveland the American farmer had become discouraged. There was no market for his product. He had slaughtered his herds and flocks, and it takes some time to replace that sort of property; that is to say, that even though prosperous conditions intervened, it took time for the farmer to stock up his farm. A fairer comparison is that made between the Roosevelt and McKinley Administration and that of Grover Cleveland. During the Cleveland Administration the total value of farm animals was $7,373,000,000, and during the four years of the Roosevelt and McKinley Administration the total value was $12,096,000,000—a difference of $4,722,000,000—a sum, as that great Democratic newspaper said in 1897, greater than the bonded indebtedness of the Union at the close of the civil war. In fact, it is almost, if not quite, double that bonded debt. The exact figures are as follows:

TOTAL VALUE FARM ANIMALS.

For the four years of Harrison's Administration	$9,693,846,177
For the four years of Cleveland's Administration	7,373,603,756
Decrease during Democratic years	2,320,242,421
For the four years of McKinley's Administration	9,125,042,542
For the four years of Cleveland's Administration	7,373,603,756
Increase during Republican years	1,751,438,786
For the four years of McKinley and Roosevelt	12,096,513,906
For the four years of Cleveland	7,373,603,756
Decrease during the four years of Democracy	4,722,910,150

Mr. Speaker, let us see upon what this prosperity of the farmer depended. Let us make some other comparisons of a different character. We heard last night a most eloquent discussion of the question as to whether the prosperity of this country was due to the discovery of gold. We heard the distinguished and eloquent gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] mention the fact that the American farmer, the American workingman, the American capitalist—all classes of people in this country—discovered gold in their pockets because of the increased business activity brought about under a Republican Administration. I have taken from the Statistical Abstract of the Government some comparisons of the export trade of this country in manufactured articles for the years 1895 and 1905. They show that the great prosperity of this country, that the great abundance of money of the country, that the fact that there is no lack of a circulating medium, as there was under a Democratic Administration, can be accounted for and are to be accounted for only by the greater business activity and the greater balance of trade in favor of this country under a Republican Administration. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In 1895 I find that we shipped abroad of agricultural implements $5,000,000 worth. In 1905, four times as much, or $20,000,000 worth. [Applause on the Republican side.] That of carriages we shipped abroad in 1895, $2,000,000 worth; in 1905, $10,000,000 worth. That of chemicals and drugs we shipped abroad in 1895, $7,000,000 worth; in 1905, $14,000,000 worth. I shall insert this entire table in my printed speech, but I shall not now weary the House by reading any more of it. I give the totals, however, Mr. Speaker, to prove my assertion that the greater prosperity and the greater volume of money in the country is to be accounted for by the fact that the conditions produced by the economical policies of the Republican party made it possible to bring in a greater amount of capital to the country. In 1895 we shipped abroad of domestic manufactures, $183,000,000 worth. In 1905, $543,000,000 worth. [Applause on the Republican side.] In other words, an excess in 1905 over 1895, of $360,000,000. The excess of exportations of manufactures in 1905 over 1895 was almost exactly double the total amount of manufactured products shipped abroad in 1895. I have shown already the figures that describe the farmers' greater share of this prosperity.

In the table referred to, which is here inserted, even figures are used, a + sign indicating that the actual figures are above, a — sign that they are below:

Exports of domestic manufactures, by principal articles, for the years 1895 and 1905.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Do your figures show where we sent these products?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I have not, Mr. Speaker, put in this table the countries where we have sent these articles, because it would make the tables too long and tedious.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will my friend from West Virginia allow me to ask a question?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I yield with great pleasure to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. How much of that exportation you were talking about was sold for a lower price in foreign countries than it was sold for in our own home markets?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama asks how much of these foreign exports were sold in other countries more cheaply than in our own markets. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, how much. I do know, however, that it is a rare thing that articles are sold abroad cheaper than they are sold in our own country. I remember the evidence given before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries on the subject, and that evidence disclosed, Mr. Speaker, this fact, that while some articles are sold abroad cheaper than they are sold at home, while in some articles there is in this country a home price and a foreign price, and that while in some instances that foreign price is less than the home price, that there is no other country in the world, whether it be a protective country or a free-trade country, that does not have a greater difference between the foreign price and the domestic price than exists in this country under the policy of protection. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman give some other country where there is a difference between the foreign price and the domestic price?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the question of the gentleman from Illinois fits very well into the reply I was making to the gentleman from Alabama, because I was just about to do what the gentleman asked me to do. I find that Great Britain is such a country, and I am glad first to furnish the gentleman from Illinois with an example drawn from Great Britain, for no matter how great the prosperity of this country may be, no matter how wise American policies may be, our Democratic friends seem always glad when they can eulogize the policies of England, and I am glad to furnish him an English example. In Great Britain the home price on steel rails is $31.50 and the British export price is $25.

Mr. RAINEY rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from West Virginia yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RAINEY. Will not the gentleman answer my question and give me some of the other countries?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I have given the gentleman one, and I was proceeding to give him others. In Germany the home price is $30 and the export price $24; in France the home price is $31 and the export price is $25.50; in Austria the home price is $31 and the export price $25.50; in Belgium the home price is $30 and the export price $24; in the United States the home price $28 and the export price is about $26.60—$1.40 difference in the United States against an average of about

$5 or $6 difference in every other country in the world, whether it be a free-trade country or a protective country. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman calls attention to goods that are shipped in cargoes in whole shiploads. Can the gentleman call attention to any other class of goods in which a price difference is made between the foreign consumer and the home consumer? And in this connection, will the gentleman also explain why it is——

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Will the gentleman kindly wait until I answer his first question? What was that question, now?

Mr. RAINEY. Are there any other goods that are shipped in shipload lots where there is a price difference made in any other country?

Mr. MANN. These things are not shipped in shiploads.

Mr. GROSVENOR. They are not shipped by shipload lots, but they are shipments by single tons.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman is talking about steel rails.

Mr. MANN. All the steel rails the gentleman has bought, I suppose, he bought by shiploads.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I will answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois. He has asked me whether these are shipload lots or not. Mr. Speaker, I do not know, and I do not care. I fancy there is no international retail business going on in any commodity, and when he asks me about the foreign price and the domestic price, or about the domestic in comparison with the foreign price, he must be asking me about wholesale business and business in considerable quantities, unless he happens to know of some retail business going on among nations. And let me go further and suggest to the gentleman that his question to me, whether I am not dealing with wholesale prices and wholesale lots, suggests the answer to nine-tenths of this complaint, that American articles are sold abroad cheaper than at home; for the fact is this, that in almost every instance they take the price that the manufacturer gives to the retailer or jobber and compare that price with the retail price in this country. And there are two reasons why that wholesale price is less—first, the wholesale price is much less than the retail price at home, and, in the next place, shippers make the very smallest possible invoice they can in order to avoid the tariff of the countries to which they are sending their product.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will my friend from West Virginia allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. With pleasure.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Now, will you state to the House what the aggregate amount of exportations in this country was for 1905 that sold for a less price in a foreign country than they did at home? Does it not reach the amount of $500,000,000?

Mr. MANN. About one-tenth of 1 per cent.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Did it not reach that large amount in 1905?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I remember the gentleman from Pennsylvania gave the correct figures.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It was $500,000,000 sold to foreign countries and exported cheaper than they sell to our own home folks.

Mr. GROSVENOR. A very little more than $500,000,000 was sold altogether.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. If the gentleman asks me whether there were $500,000,000 sold cheaper abroad, there were five hundred and forty-odd million dollars' worth sold altogether, and in 1895, under his Administration, one-third of that amount. [Applause on the Republican side.] I have shown by the figures here the difference between the home price and the foreign price in the principal countries in the world. There is no difference in the wage of the workingman whether the thing he makes is sold at home or abroad.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I suggest to my friend from West Virginia that the same wage is paid whether the goods are sold abroad or at home, and we are concerned in the wage scale, the American wage scale.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. That consideration is of course true; but I was confining my answer to the question the gentleman asked. It certainly is important to the American worker. It is important, and our home people derive a great benefit from this foreign trade. We go into other countries and compete, and still the American wageworker gets the same price for his work. He loses nothing, but secures a larger market.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman explain how it happens that the Westinghouse Company, originally an American company, and still an American company, maintains now its largest plant in England; and does it not maintain its plant there in order to escape from the clutches of the United States Steel Company.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. If that is true, I should say, Mr. Chairman, that that company, which has its patents, which protects itself from competition by patent rights, goes abroad for the purpose of avoiding what the Republican party is responsible for in this country—the high rate of American wages. [Applause on the Republican side.] And if it wants to avoid the American Steel Company it is because the American Steel Company pays the American wage for its product, and they want to get the product of cheaper labor in England and other countries, and therefore they go over there.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I do, Mr. Speaker, for a question, and one more only. I do not know how much of my time is left.

Mr. RAINEY. I say to the gentleman his explanation differs from the explanation given me about two weeks ago by the manager of the Westinghouse Company, who had just returned from England, where he has been reorganizing the English branch.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I am glad to see that there is some American company that the gentleman from Illinois has confidence in. I thought from what he said on this floor recently about the Waltham and Elgin watch companies, that he never would justify the statement of any of them.

Mr. SOUTHWICK. He has just returned from England, has he?

Mr. RAINEY. This gentleman advised me——

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Does he live in England?

Mr. RAINEY. He lives in Pittsburg.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I thought you said he had gone there.

Mr. RAINEY. I can give you his name—I do not now recall it—and you can put it in the RECORD. He advised me that the Westinghouse Company went there to get away from the American Steel Company; and he further said that, although they paid less wages there in England to English workingmen, the American workingman was worth two of them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman from West Virginia allow me to say that the Westinghouse Company is one of the largest exporters of American steel at this time and a large owner of American steel manufactures?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I did not know that, and I am obliged to the gentleman from Ohio for his suggestion.

Mr. Speaker, when my attention was diverted from the line of my argument, I was about to show that the American laboring man had got his share of this prosperity.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAINEY. I did not quite catch the remark of the gentleman from Ohio. I have just been advised as to what it was. This gentleman told me that the Westinghouse Company now exports their steel products from their English factories, and they are now competing with German companies for the mastery of the European market.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I came across the water some years ago with Mr. Westinghouse himself, the head of the concern, just after he had taken the enormous contract for lighting the underground railroads of London. He was, of course, using much of the English manufacture, but at the same time he was exporting vast quantities of American steel for use by his works not only in London, but in other great cities of Europe; and the fact remains that while he has taken with him large numbers of American skilled workmen, he is employing large quantites of English cheap labor, and has substantially mastered the business and driven his products into the consumption of the British people to an extent that has almost destroyed competition. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. I will say to the gentleman in reply that at the time he had this conversation with the president of the company, as I understand him——

Mr. GROSVENOR. With George Westinghouse himself. He lives in this city.

Mr. RAINEY. Two years ago the English plant had not been in operation six months.

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; you are quite right about that.

Mr. RAINEY. And it is within the last two years that the English plant of the Westinghouse company has built up this immense business. The gentleman will have to consult Mr. Westinghouse again to get the present status of the business.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the sundry civil bill, and ask unanimous consent that the reading of the report and the statement be dispensed with. My reason for this is that both have been printed, and the statement has been read. The statement was read in full to the House on day before yesterday, and the present statement is identically the same as the one then read, except three items, which the conferees have since agreed to. This report is now a complete report.

The three items referred to are the $3,000,000 building site in the city of Washington, the coal-test amendment, concerning which there was some misunderstanding when the matter was before the House before, and which the House conferees have agreed to as the amendment was originally adopted in the Senate and presented to the conferees, and the third item is the light-ship to be anchored at the mouth of Puget Sound. These are the only three items that were in difference when the report was recalled, namely, the light-ship, the $3,000,000 appropriation for the purchase of a site for a departmental building in the city of Washington, and the coal.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state what disposition was made of that?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, the conferees on the part of the Senate have receded from their amendment for the appropriation of $3,000,000 for the site for the Government building, and they have also receded from the appropriation for the light-ship at the mouth of Puget Sound. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota to dispense with the reading of the conference report and statement?

There was no objection.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 4, 5, 14, 22, 47, 49, 51, 53, 54, 55, 59, 62, 64, 70, 71, 79, 83, 85, 87, 88, 89, 90, 110, 120, 121, 123, 124, 132, 133, 134, 137, 147, and 148.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 16, 19, 20, 23, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 40, 41, 43, 44, 52, 58, 61, 65, 67, 68, 72, 73, 74, 76, 77, 78, 84, 86, 91, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 106, 108, 109, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 122, 125, 126, 127, 129, 130, 135, 136, 138, 139, 140, 141, 144, and 145; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 17: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In line 4 of said amendment, after the word "necessary," insert "not exceeding five thousand dollars."

Omit all after the word "Molokai," in line 6 of said amendment, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and a landing stage on the landing site at Waikolu, including the necessary appliances for landing supplies."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 18: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Stonington breakwater, Connecticut: For erection of a suitable double dwelling for the keepers of the light station at Stonington breakwater, Connecticut, six thousand dollars."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 21: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Point Arena light station, California: For rebuilding of light station and keepers' dwellings, seventy-two thousand five hundred dollars."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "eighteen thousand seven hundred dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 25: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of said amendment, after the word "June," insert the word "twentieth;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 26: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Nantucket Shoals, Massachusetts: Toward the construction of a light vessel to be placed off Nantucket Shoals, Massachusetts, fifty thousand dollars; and the total cost of said light vessel, under a contract which is hereby authorized therefor, shall not exceed one hundred and fifteen thousand dollars."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

Amendment numbered 66: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 66, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Provided, That no expense shall be incurred hereunder additional to appropriations for the Census Office for printing therefor made for the fiscal year nineteen hundred and seven; and the Director of the Census is hereby directed to report to Congress at its next session the cost incurred hereunder and the price fixed for said publication and the total received therefor."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 69: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 69, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "five hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 75: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 75, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "one hundred and fifty thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 80: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 80, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "one million four hundred and sixty-three thousand three hundred and twenty dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 81: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 81, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Omit the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment and, on page 78 of the bill, in line 13, after the word "acting," insert the words "after June thirtieth, nineteen hundred and six;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 82: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 82, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 4 of said amendment strike out the word "Interior" and in lieu thereof insert the words "Smithsonian Institution;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 92: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 92, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "nineteen thousand five hundred dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 93: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 93, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "eighteen dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 94: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 94, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "four thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 105: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 105, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 5 of said amendment strike out the word "northwest;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 107: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 107, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "eight hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 116: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 116, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "ten thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 117: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 117, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "three hundred and sixty-three thousand two hundred dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 118: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 118, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "four million two hundred and twelve thousand nine hundred and forty-four dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 119: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 119, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available after March fourth, nineteen hundred and seven, except on condition that no bar or canteen shall be maintained at said Homes for the sale of beer, wine, or other intoxicating liquors after said date;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 131: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 131, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add at the end of said amendment " ; all money expended hereunder shall be taxed by the court as a part of the cost in said judicial proceedings;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 142: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 142, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 143: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 143, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the amended paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"To continue the reequipment of the Panama Railroad, to be disbursed directly under the Isthmian Canal Commission, one million dollars; no part of said sum shall be so expended until the obligation of the Panama Railroad Company for the full amount thereof and drawing four per cent interest payable to the United States shall have been delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States and by him accepted."

And on page 164 of the bill, in line 13, strike out the words "five hundred and seventy-five" and insert in lieu thereof the words "four hundred and fifteen."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 146: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 146, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 7. From and after July first, nineteen hundred and six, all of the expenses of the supreme court of the District of Columbia mentioned below, to wit, fees of witnesses, fees of jurors, pay of bailiffs and criers, including salaries of deputy marshals who act as bailiffs or criers, and all miscellaneous expenses of said court, shall be paid one half from the revenues of the District of Columbia and the other half from the revenues of the United States: Provided, That estimates for like expenditures for the fiscal year nineteen hundred and eight and annually thereafter shall be submitted to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for transmission to Congress with the annual estimates for the District of Columbia;"

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 149: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 149, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"JAMESTOWN EXPOSITION.

"SEC. 10. That there shall be exhibited at the Jamestown Exposition by the Government of the United States from the Smithsonian Institution, the National Museum, and the Library of Congress such articles and materials of an historical nature as will serve to impart a knowledge of our colonial and national history; and such Government exhibit shall also include an exhibit from the War and Navy Departments, the Life-Saving Service, the Revenue-Cutter Service, the Army, the Navy, the Light-House Service, the Bureau of Fisheries, and an exhibit from the island of Porto Rico. And the Bureau of American Republics is hereby invited to make an exhibit illustrative of the resources and international relations of the American republics, and space in any of the United States Government exhibit buildings shall be provided for that purpose. The Jamestown Tercentennial Commission, created by an act of Congress, approved March 3d, 1905, shall, in addition to the authority and duties conferred and imposed by said act, be authorized and empowered and it shall be their duty to select, prepare, transport, and arrange for the exhibition and return of the Government exhibits herein authorized. In addition to the articles and materials which the said Jamestown Tercentennial Commission may select for exhibition as aforesaid, the President of the United States may in his discretion designate other and additional articles and materials.

"The officers and employees of the Government who may be appointed by the Jamestown Tercentennial Commission to carry out the provisions of this section and any officers and employees of the Government who may be detailed to assist them, including the officers of the Army and Navy, shall receive no compensation in addition to their regular salaries, but they shall be allowed their actual and necessary traveling expenses, together with a per diem in lieu of subsistence not to exceed four dollars. The officers of the Army and Navy shall receive said allowance in lieu of subsistence and mileage now allowed by law, and the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy may in their discretion detail retired Army and Navy officers for such duty. Any provision of law which may prohibit the detail of persons in the employ of the United States to other service than that which they customarily perform shall not apply to persons detailed to duty in connection with said Jamestown Tercentennial Exposition. And to carry out in full all of the provisions of this section not herein otherwise specifically appropriated for, the sum of two hundred thousand dollars or so much thereof as may be necessary is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be expended in accordance with law and under such rules and regulations as the said Jamestown Tercentennial Commission may prescribe.

"That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause suitable buildings to be erected on the site of the said Jamestown Tercentennial Exposition for said Government exhibit, including a suitable building for the exhibit of the United States Life-Saving Service; a fisheries building, including an aquarium; also a building for use as a place of rendezvous for the soldiers and sailors of the United States Navy and Army and of the foreign navies and armies participating in said celebration; also a building for use as a place of rendezvous for the commissioned naval and army officers participating in said celebration; also the preparation of the grounds for, the approaches thereto, and the lighting of all of said buildings. Said buildings shall be erected, as far as practicable, on the colonial style of architecture from plans prepared by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to contract for said buildings in the same manner and under the same regulations as for other public buildings of the United States: Provided, That the aggregate cost of all of said buildings, including the preparation of grounds, approaches, and lighting, shall in no event exceed the sum of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, which sum is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. At the close of the exposition the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to dispose of said buildings or the materials composing the same and of the piers which are provided for in this act, or the materials thereof, giving preference to the Jamestown Exposition Company to the extent that it shall have the option to purchase the same at an appraised value, to be ascertained in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine.

"That to the end that free and ready communication between the ships and the shore may be had, and in order to furnish ample and safe harbor for the small craft necessary to convey the soldiers and exposition visitors from the grounds to the fleet, there shall be constructed, from plans to be furnished by the Jamestown Exposition Company and approved by the Secretary of War, two piers extending from the exposition grounds into the waters of Hampton Roads, the ends of said piers to be surmounted with towers for the exhibit, if practicable, of the Light-House Service and wireless telegraph service. Said piers shall be connected by an arch sufficiently high to permit small craft to enter under it into a basin or harbor, which shall be dredged to a sufficient depth to accommodate boats drawing not more than 10 feet of water at mean low tide. And the Secretary of War is directed to contract for the construction of said piers and basin in the same manner and under the same regulations as for public structures of the United States, but the contract price shall not exceed the sum of four hundred thousand dollars, or as much thereof as may be necessary, which sum is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That before the appropriation made by this section shall become available the Jamestown Exposition Company shall file with the Secretary of the Treasury an agreement that it will, at its own expense, operate and manage said piers and basin during the period of the exposition, and that it will, at its own expense, illuminate the same: Provided further, That all small craft attached to any naval vessel of this or any foreign country, whose fleet is in the waters of Hampton Roads to participate in the celebration, shall have access to and use of said basin and piers for the purpose of communication with the exposition grounds without any charge therefor and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Navy shall prescribe: Provided further, That the same right of access and use of said basin and piers during the exposition shall be, and is hereby, reserved to the United States, but nothing herein contained shall be construed to impose upon the United States any obligation to maintain or keep in repair such piers or basin or approaches thereto or to reimburse any individual or corporation for any damage sustained in consequence of the use of said piers and basin.

"That in aid of the said Jamestown Tercentennial Exposition the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which sum shall be paid to the Jamestown Exposition Company upon satisfactory evidence being furnished the Secretary of the Treasury that the said company has expended the sum of five hundred thousand dollars on account of said exposition. Said two hundred and fifty thousand dollars shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury upon vouchers and satisfactory evidence that it has been expended for the purposes of the exposition other than salaries: Provided, That as a condition precedent to the payment of this appropriation in aid of said exposition the Jamestown Exposition Company shall agree to close the grounds of said exposition to visitors on Sunday during the period of said exposition.

"That for the erection of a permanent landing pier at James town Island on the frontage owned by the Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities, the precise location to be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and said association and to be donated by said association to the United States, the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. The Secretary of War is directed to contract for the construction of said pier in the same manner and under the same requirements as for other public structures of the United States: Provided, however, That if any pier now constructed and suitable for landing persons and material for the erection of the monument on said Jamestown Island heretofore authorized can be leased or purchased within the appropriation of fifteen thousand dollars hereby made, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to expend the sum hereby appropriated for the leasing or purchase of said pier and of a sufficient and proper amount of land adjacent thereto to give free access to the grounds owned by such Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities and the monument to be erected thereon under the provisions of an act approved March third, nineteen hundred and five.

"For the policing during the exposition period of the grounds owned by the Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities, upon Jamestown Island, and for erecting thereon suitable retiring rooms and rest stations for the visiting public, and for providing drinking water at suitable places thereon, and for such benches and other accommodations as visitors to such island will need, the sum of ten thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. The moneys appropriated by this paragraph shall be expended by and under the direction of the Tercentennial Commission, and shall not be expended until such provisions are made with such association as will insure the free access, to every part of the grounds of said association, of all visitors who may come during the period of the said exposition, and will insure free access always to that part of the grounds upon which said monument is located.

"That all articles which shall be imported from foreign countries for the sole purpose of exhibition at said exposition upon which there shall be a tariff or customs duty shall be admitted free of the payment of such duty, customs, fees, or charges, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; but it shall be lawful at any time during the exposition to sell, for delivery at the close thereof, any goods or property imported for and actually on exhibition in the exposition buildings or on the grounds, subject to such regulations for the security of the revenue and for the collection of import duties as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That all such articles, when sold or withdrawn for consumption or use in the United States, shall be subject to the duty, if any, imposed upon such articles by the revenue laws in force at the date of withdrawal, and on articles which shall have suffered diminution or deterioration from incidental handling and necessary exposure the duty, if paid, shall be assessed according to the appraised value at the time of withdrawal for consumption or use, and the penalties prescribed by law shall be enforced against any person guilty of any illegal sale or withdrawal: Provided further, That nothing in this section contained shall be construed as an invitation, express or implied, from the Government of the United States to any foreign government, state, municipality, corporation, partnership, or individual to import any such articles for the purpose of exhibition at the said exposition.

"That medals with appropriate devices, emblems, and inscriptions commemorative of said Jamestown Tercentennial Exposition and of the awards to be made to the exhibitors thereat and to successful contestants in aquatic and other contests shall be prepared for the Jamestown Exposition Company by the Secretary of the Treasury at some mint of the United States, subject to the provisions of the fifty-second section of the coinage act of eighteen hundred and ninety-three, upon the payment by the Jamestown Exposition Company of a sum equal to the cost thereof; and authority may be given by the Secretary of the Treasury to the holder for a medal properly awarded to him to have duplicates thereof made at any of the mints of the United States from gold, silver, or bronze upon the payment by him for the same of a sum equal to the cost thereof.

"That in aid of the Negro Development and Exposition Company of the United States of America to enable it to make an exhibit of the progress of the negro race in this country at the said exposition, the sum of one hundred thousand dollars is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. This sum shall be expended by the Jamestown Tercentennial Commission under rules and regulations prescribed by it and for such objects as shall be approved by both the said Negro Development and Exposition Company of the United States of America and the said Commission: Provided, however, That a reasonable proportion of said appropriation shall be expended for a building within which to make such exhibit.

"That except to the extent and in the manner by this act provided and authorized the United States Government shall not be liable on any account whatever in connection with the said exposition, and nothing in this act shall be construed so as to create any liability upon the part of the United States Government, direct or indirect, for any debt or obligation incurred, or for any claim for aid or pecuniary assistance from Congress or the Treasury of the United States in support of or in liquidation of any debts or obligations created by said Tercentennial Commission, or any other board, commission, or any person or persons whomsoever, acting or claiming to act by authority of this act in excess of the appropriations provided for in this act.

"The United States shall in no event be liable, directly or indirectly, upon any ground or for any cause whatsoever in connection with or on account of its participation in said Jamestown Tercentennial Exposition beyond the sums expressly appropriated by the act of March third, nineteen hundred and five, and by this act.

"That all moneys appropriated by this act which the Jamestown Tercentennial Commission is authorized to expend shall be drawn out of the Treasury in such manner and under such regulations as such Commission may determine, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; and at the close of the exposition period, and after the work of such Commission is completed, such Commission shall make a complete report of their actions hereunder and a complete statement of all expenditures for each of the purposes herein specified to the President of the United States for transmission to Congress."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Managers on the part of the House.

EUGENE HALE,
GEO C. PERKINS,
JAMES H. BERRY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the report, and before that motion is presented I wish to state for the information of the House that the Senate added to the sundry civil appropriation bill amendments aggregating $8,004,114. The Senate amendments that remain in the bill as the result of the conference between the two Houses aggregate $3,688,114, a reduction of $4,316,000. [Applause.]

I move the adoption of the conference report.

The motion was agreed to.

CUSTOMS COLLECTION DISTRICTS.

The House resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill (H. R. 14606) to provide for the consolidation and reorganization of customs collection districts, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES] has the floor and has nineteen minutes remaining.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, when interrupted by the colloquy between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], I was about to attempt to maintain, from the official figures, the proposition that the American workingman had been a participant in the prosperity of the country, and was about to adopt, in connection with those figures, the same comparative method, showing the difference between 1895 and 1904 or 1905. I find that in 1895 the wages of blacksmiths in the country were 26 cents an hour, and in 1904, 30 cents an hour; bricklayers in 1895 got 43 cents an hour, and in 1904, 56 cents an hour; carpenters in 1895 got 27 cents an hour, and in 1904 over 36 cents an hour; printers (compositors) in 1895 received 27 cents an hour, and in 1904, 33 cents an hour. These are occupations not protected. I shall print with my speech a list of other occupations which are protected, showing the same increase in prosperity for the laboring man in this country.

The figures referred to are as follows:

Average wages per hour paid in certain occupations in the United States in the years 1895 and 1904.

Occupation.	Establishments.		Wages.
	1895.	1904.	1895.	1904.
Blacksmiths, male, foundry and machine shop	166	192	$0.2802	$0.2979
Bricklayers, male	212	229	.4367	.5586
Carpenters, male	227	242	.2892	.3633
Compositors, male, book and job	85	96	.2731	.3365
Compositors, male, newspaper	95	135	.3827	.4916
Iron and steel, bar:
Catchers, male	13	17	.2480	.3513
Heaters, male	13	19	.4137	.5463
Heaters' helpers, male	12	18	.1917	.2651
Hot straighteners, male	12	16	.1624	.1749
Rollers, male	13	16	.5460	.6707
Roughers, male	13	20	.2715	.4029

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Yes; for a question.

Mr. STANLEY. Has the gentleman calculated the percentage of increase? He has given the wages of 1896 and the wages now; has he made any attempt to give the percentage of increase?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I have not; but take the bricklayers. In 1893 they received 43 cents an hour and in 1904, 55 cents an hour; that is practically an increase of 13 cents an hour.

Mr. STANLEY. Well, take the blacksmith. What is his increase?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. About 4 cents an hour.

Mr. STANLEY. About 10 per cent?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Forty cents a day; almost as much as an ordinary man could make in the good old Democratic days to which the gentleman from Kentucky is so strongly attached.

Mr. STANLEY. Is it not a fact that the cost of beef has increased 100 per cent, rent 60 or 70 per cent, living has increased 40 per cent, all things considered, since 1895?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. No; that is not true. According to the Government reports wages have increased per hour much more rapidly than the cost of living.

The gentleman has in mind figures which show that where the hours of labor have been considerably reduced per week that sometimes the rate of living has increased more rapidly than the rate of weekly wages, but the very table referred to shows that if people would work as many hours as they worked before—and the gentleman must remember that they work now many more days than they worked then—if they will work as many hours they will make more in proportion to the cost of living. I took the trouble to make a comparison of the wages and the rate of living, taking as a basis the wages of the bricklayers at Wheeling, W. Va., that being one of the places given in the statistical tables. I found that in 1895 a bricklayer made $0.4517 an hour. In 1903 he made $0.5625 an hour, and in 1895 he worked sixty hours per week whenever he could get any work at all, and in 1903 he had reduced his hours of labor six hours a week.

Now, let us see how that works out. The week's wages in 1895, sixty hours, at $0.4517 an hour, were $27.10, and the week's wages in 1903, fifty-four hours, at $0.5625 an hour, were $30.37; and that is $3.27 increase in the week's wages under the policy of protection, although there has been a decrease of six hours' work per week.

Let us see how that would work out for forty weeks. I take it that a bricklayer may work that much each year in that climate. I take it that he could work that long, I mean, under conditions like the present, when there is work for him to do, and not under the conditions that existed when the gentleman's party was in power and bricklayers tramped the country for work. [Applause on the Republican side.] In 1895, if he worked forty weeks at $27.10 that would give him $1,084. In 1903, if he worked forty weeks at $30.37 that would give him $1,215—a decrease of two hundred and forty hours and an increase in wages of $131. Now, you may take the amount spent for food, according to the tables the gentleman refers to, and make your comparison, and you will find that the average family of such a workman would have spent in 1895 for food $411, leaving $673.

In 1903 they would have expended $449, leaving $765, or $93 more. In other words, a man would have worked in 1895 two hundred and forty hours more, and in 1903, after paying the farmers the increased price of farm products, having worked two hundred and forty hours less, he would have to his credit $93 more. If the gentleman will take these tables and work them out, he will see what the actual result is. I will insert here the calculation in detail:

Wages of bricklayers at Wheeling, W. Va.

Year.	Cents per hour.	Hours per week.
1895	45.17	60
1903	56.25	54
	[a] 11.08	[b] 6

[a] Increase. [b] Decrease.

Week's wages in 1895 (60 hours, at 45.17 cents per hour) was ... $27.102
Week's wages in 1905 [a] (54 hours, at 56.25 cents per hour) was ... 30.375

Increase in wages ... 3.273

Wages for forty weeks.

1895, $27.102 × 40 (2,400 hours, at 45.17 cents per hour) ... $1,084.08
1903, $30.375 × 40 (2,160 [b] hours, at 56.25 cents per hour) ... 1,215.00

Increased wages ... 130.92

It is estimated by the Commissioner of Labor that wage-earners making annually over $1,000 and less than $1,200 spend 38 per cent of their wages for food, and those making from $1,200 to $1,400 spend about 37 per cent for food.

Spent for food.

1895, 38 per cent of $1,084.08, or $411.95, leaving ... $672.13
1903, 37 per cent of $1,215, or $449.55, leaving ... 765.45

Spends for food $37.60 more, and has left $93.32 more.

If he had worked as many hours in the forty weeks of 1903 as he did in the forty weeks of 1895, he would have made (240 hours, at 56.25 cents per hour) $135 more, or $1,350 in all. This is $265.92 more than received for same number of hours in 1895, a saving after the grocery bills were paid of $228.32 in 1903 more than in 1895.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from West Virginia if the raise in wages of the bricklayer is not due to the act of the bricklayers' union in raising their own wages during the time the gentleman has spoken of.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I am very confident that the effort of organized workingmen to raise their own wages has had much to do with it, but organized working people could not raise wages under conditions like yours when there were no wages to be had under any circumstances. [Applause on the Republican side.] And let me say that the opportunity for labor, organized and unorganized, is when the policies of the Republican party are in vogue in this country, and that they have no opportunity when the gentleman's party is in power.

Mr. STANLEY. As I understand the gentleman, his argument is that if the workingmen had worked as much in 1895 or 1896 as now he would have made as much or more, and the difference in his tables is hypothecated upon the theory——

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Oh, the gentleman misunderstood me. I say the workingman worked more hours a week, whenever he got a chance to work, in 1896 than he does in 1906, but that working fewer hours per week in 1906 he makes about 25 per cent more money per week.

Mr. STANLEY. I wish to say to the gentleman that his theory is hypothecated upon the single instance of the bricklayers' union or the bricklayer's wages, which is the result of action on the part of an organized band of workingmen, and if he will examine Dun and Bradstreet's report, which is a strictly nonpolitical report, he will see that the rate of wages has increased 15 or 20 per cent in the last ten years and that the rate of living has increased more than double that amount. I call his attention also to the statistics of 1903–4, and if he will examine that he will see that the increase in wages between 1895 and 1901 is merely nominal. I call the gentleman's attention also to the fact, and he may differ with me or not, as he likes, relying now upon his and my knowledge of conditions as they exist, that food stuffs, meats, timber, fabrics, articles made from steel, rents, all the material things that are necessary to a workingman's existence, have increased from 40 to 100 per cent.

Mr. OLMSTED. The difference is that now the workingman is able to buy them and in 1896 he could not buy any of those things.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. The fact is, I repeat, that the tables show that the rate of wages per hour in comparison with the cost of living have gone up. There are some places where the workingman has been so constantly employed that he has thought he could afford to reduce his hours of work. If the gentleman is complaining because labor has reduced its hours of labor, that is a controversy between him and labor. I am simply calling attention to the facts which are undisputed, or should be—the official statistics—showing that the rate of wages has advanced more rapidly hourly than the rate of living in this country has advanced.

Mr. HINSHAW. Is not the gentleman's contention further proven by the fact that the savings banks of the country have piled up enormous sums of money which the workingmen themselves have put therein? They have increased right along through these years.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Why, unquestionably. I happen to have here the savings-bank statistics of 1905 and 1895. The number of such banks has increased 220, an increase of 21 per cent. In 1895 the number of depositors was 4,800,000, and in 1905, 7,600,000, an increase in the number of depositors of 2,820,000, being an increase of 57 per cent nearly over your Democratic times. The amount of deposits in 1895 were $1,810,000,000. In 1905 they were $3,261,000,000, an increase of $1,450,000,000, being an increase of 80 per cent over the Democratic year. Let us see now about the average depositor. In 1895 he had to his credit $371.36; in 1905 he had $423.74, an increase of $52.38 for each depositor, being an increase of 14 per cent. Let us see what these people who patronize savings banks have done, averaging their deposits over the whole of the country, per capita. The average per capita in the United States in 1895 was $25.88; in 1905 it was $39.17, an increase of $13.29; in other words, an increase of 53 per cent per capita in the savings banks in this country on a comparison of 1905 with 1895.

I now give the exact figures, taken from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1905, which is the last report:

SAVINGS-BANK STATISTICS.

Number of banks:
1905	1,237
1895	1,017
		220
Increase, nearly 21 per cent.
Number of depositors:
1905	7,696,299
1895	4,875,519

1905	$3,261,236,119
1895	1,810,597,023
		1,450,639,096
Increase, 80 per cent.

SAVINGS-BANK STATISTICS—continued.

Average due each depositor:
1905	$423.74
1895	371.36
		52.38
Increase, 14 per cent.
Average per capita in the United States:
1905	$39.17
1895	25.88
		13.29
Increase, 53 per cent.

Why, Mr. Speaker, if I had time, I have the figures here to show, by comparison in every line of industry, the story of American prosperity.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. JAMES. Have you any statistics here showing the relative increase in the price of coal miners' wages as compared with the increased cost of living?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I have not. I regret to say I have not, because, from a limited personal knowledge, I can assure the gentleman that the figures would be exceedingly desirable. I happen to live in a coal-mining district, and even, as the other day the gentleman's colleague from Kentucky asserted, that a Kentuckian could talk on whisky, so can a West Virginian on conditions that concern the coal-mining business of this country. [Applause on the Republican side.] In 1892 in the section in which I live the coal digger was getting for his services for digging coal 50 cents a ton. When it was known over this country that Grover Cleveland had been elected President and that the Democratic party was in power, pledged to change the economical policies of this country, everything went to pieces, and nothing with greater rapidity than the coal-mining business. The first thing that happened to the coal-mining business was the reduction of the miners' wages 25 per cent under that Cleveland Administration. [Applause on the Republican side.] Not only that, but with that reduction the miner could not sell his labor, because the coal operator could not get orders for his coal. The miner tramped from one end of the field to the other looking for work. Now the coal operators in West Virginia are advertising for labor, and are not able to get what they need. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is no man in the coal-mining region who can work and who will work who is not employed at good wages, whether he digs coal or does any other kind of work. [Applause on the Republican side.] But the Republican party in the course of time came back into power. What happened? No sooner was an opportunity given to adjust conditions to the new order of things and to realize the promise of Republicanism than in less than a year the wages of the coal diggers in West Virginia went up 25 per cent again. [Applause on the Republican side.] Subsequent to that time, let me tell the gentleman from Kentucky, there was another advance, and within the last two months, yes, within the last six weeks, there has been still another advance. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I yield with great pleasure.

Mr. JAMES. Is this prosperity so glowingly described by the gentleman among the miners of West Virginia the cause of the strikes that we have read about there, and the arrests of laboring men under injunctions issued by the courts, and the trial of them without jury, and the sending of them to jail—is that caused by the prosperity and increase of wages?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the question involves a statement of fact which is not correct. The gentleman from Kentucky does not happen to know exactly what he is talking about. But the truth is that such strikes as they have had in West Virginia recently have been due, I take it, to Republican prosperity, because the miners struck for recognition of their union, and they struck for an increase of wages and got the increase of wages, at least, in every instance when they have demanded it.

Mr. FREDERICK LANDIS. They never struck during a Democratic administration.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Strikes in the coal region of West Virginia during a Democratic administration generally consisted in striking a new place for a job. Why, heavens on earth, what would they strike for when your party was in power? There was nothing to strike at. [Applause on the Republican side.] These same laboring men have become so independent we are begging them to work and unable to get them, while they were begging for work when your party was in power.

I do not know how many strikes there were during your administration, and——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from West Virginia yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I always yield with pleasure to the gentleman from Tennessee. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman says when the Democratic party is in power that people are generally going begging. Now, I want to ask the gentleman why it was Secretary Foster went begging in New York to get gold to run the Government under the Harrison Administration?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Oh, Mr. Speaker, Secretary Foster did not go begging.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. He went around swapping legal-tender money to get gold.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, there was no trouble to get money with which to run the country when the Republican party was in power. I admit that all calamities do not work precisely alike. Sometimes they come suddenly and without notice, and again there is notice. At Martinique, when that great disaster occurred, people had no notice of it, but recently at the eruption of Vesuvius people knew of the descending lava in sufficient time to get out of the way. So the last Democratic Administration, fortunately for the people of this country, did not come into power until some months after it had been elected. When it was known over this country, Mr. Speaker, that the Democratic party had been elected to power, instantly the business of the country ceased; and how does it help the case of these gentlemen to know that it did not wait for the actual coming of their party into power, but that immediately when it was known that the Democratic party was to be in power in this country, pledged as it was to its false views, the prosperity of the country died instantly, chilled to death, as energy, enterprise, confidence, and resultant prosperity always are in this country by the mere oncoming shadow of the threatening Democracy? [Applause on the Republican side.]

I have shown by comparison of Republican years with Democratic years, confining myself, whenever statistics were available for that purpose, to comparisons of 1895 and 1905, that the farmers of the country under the policy of protection are able to market a vastly increased product at a much better price than they could obtain for a smaller product when different policies obtained. I have shown also that under protection the workingmen of the country have been steadily employed at much better wages than they could secure when only partially employed while the Democracy was in power. I wish to insert for the information of the House and the country a comparative table of wages in the United States and several European countries, which was first put into the RECORD by that able Democrat the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I mention him in connection with this statement because he is entitled to the credit of having first put it into the RECORD, and I wish the figures to have his able indorsement.

I here insert the table:

The cost of living in those countries can not be less than in this country unless the foreign workingman eats less food or of a poorer quality than the American man, because our meat and other agricultural products go to those countries for sale. The fact is, of course, that the foreign workingman does live for less than the American workingman, for the reason that he can not afford to live so well, and for the further reason that the European farmer and farm laborer is less prosperous there than here.

In considering the question whether we are to continue the policy of protection, the growing importance of the Orient in the world's commerce is no longer to be ignored. Both China and Japan are introducing modern machinery and methods, and their laboring people work industriously long hours and are exceedingly skillful and adaptable. The time is near at hand when if the policy of protection should be abandoned the workingmen of this country will be brought into competition with the conditions which exist in those countries—in Japan, for instance, where farm laborers receive 16 cents per day; factory employees, if men, 15 cents per day, if women, 10 cents, and where coal miners average 12 cents per day.

I insert here the following extract from the very able speech of the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES], delivered in this House on March 13 last:

The Japanese Empire embraces 147,655 square miles of territory. Of this small territory, less than the State of California, only 15.7 per cent is arable land, including plains and pasture lands. Excluding plains and pasture lands, only 12.9 per cent, or 19,150 square miles, is actually arable, the balance being mountains. And yet in this small compass, according to the census of 1899, 44,260,000 Japanese live. In the light of these facts one can understand why the Japanese would fight a great nation in order to get room in which to expand.

These are some of the wages, expressed in our money, paid for the different kinds of labor in Japan in 1904, according to the report of the Japanese commissioners to the St. Louis Exposition:

Farm laborers (average), 16 cents per day.
Laborers in silk culture (average), 16½ cents per day.
Operatives for reeling silk (average), 10 cents per day.
Farm laborers, by the year, male, $16.
Farm laborers, by the year, female, $8.50.
Metal miners (average), 13½ cents per day.
Coal miners (average), 12 cents per day.
Timbermen (average), 11 cents per day.
Mill hands (average), 8½ cents per day.
Smelterers (average), 10 cents per day.
Factory employees, male, 15 cents per day.
Factory employees, female, 10 cents per day.
Tobacco factory employees, male, 22½ cents per day.
Tobacco factory employees, female, 10 cents per day.
Machine shops, 27½ cents per day.
Carpenters and plasterers, 29½ cents per day.
Stone masons, 33½ cents per day.
Shoemakers, 25 cents per day.
Tailors, Japanese clothes, 22½ cents per day.
Tailors, foreign clothes, 25 cents per day.
Skilled artisans, 50 cents per day.

Mr. FASSETT. Is that in gold?

Mr. HAYES. That is in our money.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Do those figures include the feeding of these Japanese?

Mr. HAYES. They do not include feeding them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The wages for the farm laborers do?

Mr. HAYES. They probably do, but not the others.

In China wages are still lower, as will appear from an extract from a consular report which I shall embody in my printed speech. It is as follows:

The actual rate of wages in China seems small to one unacquainted with the cheapness of the necessaries of life here and unfamiliar with the narrow scope of a Chinese laborer's needs. Agricultural laborers are paid in copper the equivalent of about $1.50 to $2 United States currency per month. Unskilled laborers in the city are paid about 2½ cents per diem and supplied with two meals. Skilled carpenters receive 20 to 30 cents per day; masons and painters the same; domestic servants, $3 to $10 per month; hostlers, $3.50 per month. In all branches of labor it is difficult to give exact figures. The minimum at which a laborer can be hired is the actual cost of the most frugal subsistence. (Special Consular Reports, Vol. XIII, Part II, page 323.)

Mr. Speaker, in 1892 the Democratic party, upon a platform embodying the policies upon which the speeches of their party leaders in this House recently made show that they propose again to go to the country, definitely promised greater prosperity in this country than the people had been able to enjoy under Republican rule. The people tried their party and the result is history—deplorable history. Fortunately for the Republican party, that experiment is well remembered. The recollection of it will be in the mind of every voter in this country when he deposits his ballot next fall.

In 1892 the defeat of the Republican party was not, in my opinion, due so much to restlessness among the people as to a selfish desire of certain manufacturing interests in the country who desired to take away the benefits of protection from the so-called "raw materials" which enter into their finished product, while retaining it upon the latter. There are signs of the same selfish desire to be seen now. I wish I could say, not only to those Members of this House who represent eastern manufacturing districts, but to their constituents, that this purpose, unworthy as it seems to me, will never be accomplished. In the first place it is not right. In the next, the voting power in the House of Representatives is not now, and will not be, with those who entertain that notion. The large interests of the country ought to know that they can not secure this object even by restoring the Democratic party to power. They tried it in 1892, when the selfishness of their plan was disguised under the high-sounding Cleveland phrase of "capturing the markets of the world." What they got was not what Mr. Cleveland promised them—that is, the Wilson bill with coal, iron ore, and other products of like character on the free list—but the Wilson-Gorman bill measure, which no one has yet been able to characterize politely except Mr. Cleveland, who called it "party perfidy and party dishonor."

It is not to be denied that there are evils attendant upon prosperous times as well as upon times of general depression. Incidentally, however, it is worth mentioning that starvation is not one of them. But when all the people are able to purchase, those who have much to sell—whether it be transportation or some commodity—will make great wealth. How to regulate and mitigate the evils attendant upon prosperity are the problems of statesmanship to-day. Certainly no one will contend that the destruction of prosperity is the remedy. If there ever were any doubt as to the advisability of employing that remedy, we learned better during the last Democratic Administration. The energy of the present Republican Administration in prosecuting the owners of great wealth when they have sought to deprive others of their lawful opportunities, must certainly have satisfied the most exacting popular demand. On this closing night of the session the Republican Members of this House, as they prepare to go back to their constituents, may do so with full confidence that the people of the country will not, in the coming election, or two years from now, repeat their former great folly of destroying prosperity by the restoration of the Democratic party to power.

Geographically summarized, there is shown to have been an increase in the deposits of banks located in the New England States from $1,193,300,000 in 1896 to $1,791,400,000 in 1905, a gain of $598,100,000. The increase in the Eastern States during this period was $2,961,000,000, or from $2,291,700,000 in 1896 to $5,252,700,000 in 1905. In the Southern States the increase was from $221,700,000 to $767,300,000, an increase of $545,600,000. The deposits of banks in the Middle Western States which reported in 1896, amounting approximately to $877,800,000, have now increased to $2,461,200,000, showing a gain in that section of $1,583,400,000. The banks of the Western States increased their deposit accounts from $128,800,000 to $430,900,000, a gain of $302,100,000. In the Pacific States the banks gained $397,700,000 in deposits, or an increase from $231,800,000 to $629,500,000.

The deposits in the banks in the island possessions (Hawaii only) were first stated for 1900, when they amounted to $3,096,174.

It will be noted from the accompanying table that the Southern States show the largest percentage of increase in deposits during the period from June 30, 1896, to June 30, 1905, the percentage of increase in this section being 246.1, followed by the Western States, where the ratio of increase is 234.6; and, in the order named, the Middle Western States with 180.3, the Pacific States 171.6, the Eastern States 129.2, and the New England States 50.1. The average of increase for the United States is 129.2 per cent.

[Mr. CLARK of Missouri addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I addressed the House at some length on a previous occasion on the subject of an eight-hour law. In my remarks then I made the following statement, which has not been challenged:

No measure in recent years has been so stubbornly resisted by organized greed as the heroic efforts of organized labor to place upon the statute books of the country this humane bill making eight hours a legal day's work. Over a month ago the minority of the Committee on Labor stole a march on the majority of the committee and ordered a favorable report of this bill, but the chairman of the committee neglected to make the report in accordance with the instructions of a majority of a quorum of the Committee on Labor until the day before yesterday. Then the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER], the chairman of the Committee on Labor, reluctantly filed a report, knowing that it would be too late for the bill to pass the House this session and become a law. He held back the report in violation of every rule and every precedent until a couple of days before the time he knew the Congress was going to adjourn.

I repeat it now, and I charge the Republicans with the responsibility for the defeat of the eight-hour law. So much for that.

Equally futile have been all the attempts of the Democratic members of the Judiciary Committee to obtain action of any kind on the Pearre anti-injunction bill. After months of time-killing, tedious discussions, and near the close of the session, certain points that had been fully discussed and fully considered, and upon which every member had made up his mind, were referred to a subcommittee of three, the two Republican members of which had already committed themselves on the record against the bill. That subcommittee is directed to report at the next session. It is noted that the election for the Sixtieth Congress will then have been held. Men may be excused for opposing a labor bill openly and from the standpoint of an honest belief, but who does not despise a cowardly evasion? No one should receive a workingman's vote for a seat in this body who is not willing to place himself of record for or against labor's demands on the floor of the House, or by other act equally solemn and unequivocal.

Of more far-reaching importance would be a change in the practice in the Federal courts to limit the use of injunctions. On this subject I insert an extract from the argument of Thomas Carl Spelling, esq., of New York, attorney for the American Federation of Labor, made before the Judiciary Committee, which appears to be peculiarly appropriate:

The framers of the Constitution, according to all interpretations, took care that bounds should be set to equitable jurisdiction. It has universally been held that the equitable powers are those, and those only, that were possessed by the English judges at the time the colonies separated. But these judges single out a class in the community and stretch forth the hand of arbitrary power to that class exclusively.

Rome changed from a republic to an empire by abuse on the part of the tribunes of power to enjoin. First, they used it to forbid, next to command; then came the emperor. The next use of the power may be to forbid competition. The doctrine that a right to do business is property is dangerous. The Roman tribunes of course abused this power, as all unusual and inordinate power will be abused; and the people, unable to return to former conditions because the Roman employers' associations opposed and exerted an undue influence in the Roman Senate, cried out, "Ave imperator!" Then arose Carl the Great, first Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire of the middle ages. Thus extension and usurpation of the power to enjoin ripened into the undisputed power of one man to legislate, adjudicate, and execute.

By the ancient and startling example above cited every American citizen should be forewarned. The abuses of power, the usurpations by the courts, are increasing both in flagrancy and number; and unless checked by legislation workingmen will soon find themselves reduced to a condition of abject servitude, retaining barely the privileges to breathe and toil for such pittances as are reluctantly doled out to them by their taskmasters.

These, sir, and other matters of growing interest to labor have been ruthlessly thrust aside by the Republican majority at this and prior sessions. Some of them are set forth in labor's bill of grievances, which has been presented to the persons named therein, but without avail. I now insert the bill of grievances, containing a clear and succinct statement of labor's just demands and of Republican indifference with respect thereto.

LABOR'S GRIEVANCES.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 21, 1906.

Hon. THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States;

Hon. WM. P. FRYE,
President pro tempore United States Senate;

Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
Speaker House of Representatives, United States.

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned executive council of the American Federation of Labor, and those accompanying us in the presentation of this document, submit to you the subject-matter of the grievances which the workmen of our country feel by reason of the indifferent position which the Congress of the United States has manifested toward the just, reasonable, and necessary measures which have been before it these past several years, and which particularly affect the interests of the working people, as well as by reason of the administrative acts of the executive branches of this Government and the legislation of the Congress relating to these interests. For convenience, the matters of which we complain are briefly stated, and are as follows:

The law commonly known as the "eight-hour law" has been found ineffective and insufficient to accomplish the purpose of its designers and framers. Labor has, since 1894, urged the passage of a law so as to remedy the defects, and for its extension to all work done for or on behalf of the Government. Our efforts have been in vain.

Without hearing of any kind granted to those who are the advocates of the eight-hour law and principle, Congress passed, and the President signed, an appropriation bill containing a rider nullifying the eight-hour law and principle in its application to the greatest public work ever undertaken by our Government, the construction of the Panama Canal.

The eight-hour law in terms provides that those intrusted with the supervision of Government work shall neither require nor permit any violations thereof. The law has been grievously and frequently violated. The violations have been reported to the heads of several Departments, who have refused to take the necessary steps for its enforcement.

While recognizing the necessity for the employment of inmates of our penal institutions, so that they may be self-supporting, labor has urged in vain the enactment of a law that shall safeguard it from the competition of the labor of convicts.

In the interest of all of our people, and in consonance with their almost general demand, we have urged Congress for some tangible relief from the constantly growing evil of induced and undesirable immigration, but without result.

Recognizing the danger of Chinese immigration, and responsive to the demands of the people, Congress years ago enacted an effective Chinese-exclusion law; yet, despite the experience of the people of our own country, as well as those of other countries, the present law is flagrantly violated, and now by act of Congress it is seriously proposed to invalidate that law and reverse the policy.

The partial relief secured by the laws of 1895 and 1898, providing that seamen shall not be compelled to endure involuntary servitude, has been seriously threatened at each succeeding Congress. The petitions to secure for the seamen equal right with all others have been denied, and a disposition shown to extend to other workmen the system of compulsory labor.

Under the guise of a bill to subsidize the shipping industry, a provision is incorporated, and has already passed the Senate, providing for a term of conscription, which would make compulsory naval service a condition precedent to employment on privately owned vessels.

Having in mind the terrible and unnecessary loss of life attending the burning of the Slocum in the harbor of New York, the wreck of the Rio de Janeiro at the entrance to the bay of San Francisco, and other disasters on the waters too numerous to mention, in nearly every case the great loss of life was due to the undermanning and the unskilled manning of such vessels, we presented to Congress measures that would, if enacted, so far as human law could do, make impossible the awful loss of life. We have sought this remedy more in the interests of the traveling public than in that of the seamen, but in vain.

Having in mind the constantly increasing evil growing out of the parsimony of corporations, of towing several undermanned and unequipped vessels called "barges" on the high seas, where, in case of storm or stress, they are cut loose to drift or sink and their crews to perish, we have urged the passage of a law that shall forbid the towing of more than one such vessel unless they shall have an equipment and a crew sufficient to manage them when cut loose and sent adrift, but in vain.

The antitrust and interstate-commerce laws enacted to protect the people against monopoly in the products of labor and against discrimination in the transportation thereof, have been perverted, so far as the laborers are concerned, so as to invade and violate their personal liberty as guaranteed by the Constitution. Our repeated efforts to obtain redress from Congress have been in vain.

The beneficent writ of injunction, intended to protect property rights has, as used in labor disputes, been perverted so as to attack and destroy personal freedom and in a manner to hold that the employer has some property rights in the labor of the workman. Instead of obtaining the relief which labor has sought, it is seriously threatened with statutory authority for existing judicial usurpation.

The Committee on Labor of the House of Representatives was instituted at the demand of labor to voice its sentiments, to advocate its rights, and to protect its interests. In the past two Congresses this committee has been so organized as to make ineffectual any attempt labor has made for redress. This being the fact in the last Congress, labor requested the Speaker to appoint on the Committee on Labor members who, from their experience, knowledge, and sympathy, would render in this Congress such service as the committee was originally designed to perform. Not only was labor's request ignored, but the hostile make-up of the committee was accentuated.

Recently the President issued an order forbidding any and all Government employees, upon the pain of instant dismissal from the Government service, to petition Congress for any redress of grievances or for any improvement in their condition. Thus the constitutional right of citizens to petition must be surrendered by the Government employee in order that he may obtain or retain his employment.

We present these grievances to your attention because we have long, patiently, and in vain waited for redress. There is not any matter of which we have complained but for which we have in an honorable and lawful manner submitted remedies. The remedies for these grievances proposed by labor are in line with fundamental law, and with the progress and development made necessary by changed industrial conditions.

Labor brings these, its grievances, to your attention because you are the representatives responsible for legislation and for failure of legislation. The toilers come to you as your fellow-citizens who, by reason of their position in life, have not only with all other citizens an equal interest in our country, but the further interest of being the burden-bearers, the wage-earners of America. As labor's representatives we ask you to redress these grievances, for it is in your power so to do.

Labor now appeals to you, and we trust that it may not be in vain. But if perchance you may not heed us, we shall appeal to the conscience and the support of our fellow-citizens.

Very respectfully,

Samuel Gompers, James Duncan, James O'Connell, Max Morris, D. A. Hayes, Daniel J. Keefe, Wm. D. Huber, Joseph F. Valentine, John B. Lennon, Frank Morrison, executive council, American Federation of Labor.

Now, sir, while needed and important labor bills have been long postponed, the Republican party, in power, has not been slow in fortifying the beneficiaries of the present iniquitous fiscal system by amendments and in the other directions—for instance, through the form of a revision of the military laws by the Dick military bill in 1903. The law was by that act so far changed as to establish militarism more firmly and in a more aggravated form than in Germany, Russia, or any of the military despotisms of Europe.

Two sections of that drastic measure provide as follows:

SEC. 2150. All able-bodied male citizens of the United States, and persons of foreign birth who shall have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States under and in pursuance of the laws thereof, between the ages of 18 and 45 years, are hereby declared to constitute the national forces, and, with such exceptions and under such conditions as may be prescribed by law, shall be liable to perform military duty in the service of the United States.

SEC. 2277. The militia shall consist of every able-bodied male citizen of the respective States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and every able-bodied male of foreign birth who has declared his intention to become a citizen, who is more than 18 and less than 45 years of age, and shall be divided into two classes—the organized militia, to be known as the National Guard of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia, or by such other designations as may be given them by the laws of the respective States or Territories, and the remainder to be known as the Reserve Militia.

There was no delay in obtaining action on that bill. It went in and out of committee rooms with flying colors, as the trusts, railroad companies, and other monopolistic employers of labor pressed the button. And after it had passed both Houses it was signed by the President with equal promptness.

Now, under the provisions of that law, every able-bodied citizen—the members of a labor union, for instance—is made part and parcel of the reserve military force, both of the Federal Government and of the respective States. So, now, if a strike occurs, an unfair, slave-driving employer may invoke military aid, and every laborer may be made to bear arms for the purpose of putting down a strike declared by his own organization; or a regiment of strike breakers may be mustered into service to accomplish the same end. Surely no workingman in this Republic, whether belonging to any organization or not, should rest contented for a day until a repeal or a material modification of that act has been secured.

Sir, in the confusion arising from several matters affecting labor interests, facilities are offered for deception being practiced upon voters by Republican candidates. The vital and decisive thing, not to be lost sight of for a moment, is the effect upon the election of the Speaker of the next Congress of voting for candidates of the respective parties.

Of what avail, as affecting labor interests, to rely upon or value to any extent the promises of Republican candidates to support labor measures when they know in making them that if the Republicans have a majority of the membership in the next Congress, the opportunity to vote either for or against such a bill will never be afforded. The only way to bind such candidates effectively for labor bills is to exact pledges from them not to enter the party caucus for Speaker, and to vote for the adoption of a set of rules entirely different from those now in vogue. Of course not one of them will, in good faith, give any such pledge. There is nothing surer, barring death, than that, if a Republican be reelected Speaker, he will shape and control all the proceedings, from action on bills in the House down to the most trivial and obscure transactions behind the closed doors of committee rooms.

The House is not now representative, except in the sense that in the person of the Speaker it represents a despotism. Before any relief can be had by labor, or by any other honest interests, there must be a change in personnel of the Speaker and in the rules of procedure. These are impossible without a change in the party complexion of the House. This is obvious, and nothing is gained by attempting to conceal the facts. No attempt is now made to cloak the autocratic character of the Speaker's power under the rules which he and his little coterie have formulated and forced on the people by unsparing use of the party lash. The Speaker has publicly declared his personal responsibility for all legislation, and on June 28, 1906, Hon. W. W. RUCKER, a Member from Missouri, on the floor of the House made the following statement, which was not denied:

The committees of this House are carefully formed, so as to advance or prevent legislation, as the party in power wishes. For months friends of the workingman sought to induce the Committee on Labor to report the eight-hour bill, but their efforts were futile until, on May 29, when it happened that only seven members of the committee—four Democrats and three Republicans—were present, and the Democrats, being in the majority, ordered the bill favorably reported. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] was authorized to make a report. His report on the bill was filed in the House on June 26. I appealed to the Speaker to-day to recognize me for the purpose of asking unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill, and he promptly refused my request in a manner quite emphatic. I soon realized that even though I could speak with the tongue of angels, and had all faith so that I might remove mountains, yet I could not possibly move a Republican Speaker of this House to consent to legislation in the interest of 3,000,000 American workingmen. Thus this just measure, ordered reported by Democratic votes, will die on the Calendar because we have not a Democratic Speaker in the chair.

In view of these facts and these considerations, any yielding in the coming campaign to promises and pledges made by Republican candidates for Congress, to the extent of voting for them, would be so flagrantly foolish as not to admit of any standard of comparison.

JOSEPHINE V. SPARKS.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a conference report, and I ask unanimous consent for the omission of the reading of the report, and that the statement may be read instead.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17842) "granting a pension to Josephine V. Sparks," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

H. C. LOUDENSLAGER,
WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

P. J. MCCUMBER,
N. B. SCOTT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

Conference report on disagreeing votes between Senate and House on bill 17842, granting a pension to Josephine V. Sparks.

The House passed this bill at $8 per month, and the Senate amended it to $12 per month. The result of the conference is that the Senate recedes from its amendment, and agrees to the House rate of $8 per month.

H. C. LOUDENSLAGER,
WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
House Conferees.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the report.

The question was taken; and the report was adopted.

On motion of Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, the motion by which the report was adopted was laid on the table.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words to the House about the Jamestown raid, headed by my friend from Virginia [Mr. MAYNARD] on the left. The parliamentary situation was such when the conference on the sundry civil bill came in with that item in it that there was no use trying to beat it. I find that the parliamentary situation has a nasty way of getting in my way lately anyway. [Applause.] When that bill came from the committee——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the parliamentary status explained now. Has the gentleman asked unanimous consent to proceed?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The time was yielded by the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has two minutes.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. There is the same parliamentary situation again, Mr. Speaker. It appears against me once more. When I was chairman of the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions I opposed that Jamestown raid and the bold buccaneers who came up to scuttle the United States Treasury—and the most delightful lot of buccaneers I ever had anything to do with—and the minority report was written by myself and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BOWERSOCK] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LE FEVRE] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. POLLARD].

You all read it, every one of you, and you knew that the Jamestown appropriation ought not to go through. But I want to put this credit where this credit is due. There is the man who did it. It was not done by the Senators from Virginia. The rules of this House prevented that going onto the sundry civil bill in the House, because it was not the law. In the Senate, with that delightful looseness which they have in their rules, they put this amendment on, and I understand the Senators from Virginia are going to get the credit of it. But it does not belong to them.

Mr. RYAN. Just a question. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to whom he refers by saying "this man?"

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MAYNARD]. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. I want to suggest to the gentleman that having known the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MAYNARD] a good long while, if there is anything loose about the Capitol, you had better take charge of it or you will lose it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. He had the chairman of that committee against him; and not one single time did he attempt to do anything except to put that bill through in the fairest possible way. He had a great many of the authorities of the House against him; and he went ahead with his infernal scheme [laughter], and he carried it through over our heads, and it was not the Senators on the other side who succeeded in getting the measure enacted.

If you will indulge me for a few moments, I want to read something that has recently been brought to my attention in connection with these bold buccaneers who came up under the lead of Mr. Henry St. George Tucker from Norfolk to loot the United States Treasury in this most extraordinary way. [Laughter.]

Last year they came to us with a beautiful camel, and they introduced the nose of the camel inside the tent. [Laughter.] They said it is a harmless camel. It is the king of beasts; and you should all be acquainted with it. We shook hands with the camel, and inserted his nose into the tent, and he got $250,000 on that insertion [laughter]; and then they came this year, and they pretended it was the same old camel, and they wanted to get just a little more, and they only got $1,340,000 more. [Laughter and ironical cries of "shame."]

This was the case of Bully Hayes, the last buccaneer of the South Sea Islands. He bought an abandoned ship of the London Missionary Society. In the locker he found a flag, and on it was inscribed "L. M. S." With that old ship and that old flag, he went down to the South Sea Islands, where the islanders all knew that it was the emblem of the venerable London Missionary Society.

The islanders were familiar with the vessel and the old flag, under which they had gathered many times for song and worship. They flocked on board with shouts of welcome.

Our committee extended a hearty welcome to the eight buccaneers from Norfolk.

This time Bully Hayes led them into the hold for prayers, and as a benediction clapped on the hatches and headed away for the sugar and cotton plantations, where he sold the congregation. [Great laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is recognized.

[Mr. CLARK of Missouri addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I know that what I shall read the Republicans will enjoy, because it is entitled "When Democracy will die." In reply to the repeated Republican assertion that the Democratic party is dead, I will say that I heard in the House last night a funeral oration over the Democratic party by the Reverend Doctor CUSHMAN that brings a poem to mind. An Old Hickory Democrat has put into verse the following conditions under which and the time when Democracy will die:

WHEN DEMOCRACY WILL DIE.

When the lion eats grass like an ox,
And the fishworm swallows the whale;
When the terrapin knits woolen socks;
And the hare is outrun by the snail;
When serpents walk upright like men,
And doodle bugs travel like frogs;
When the grasshopper feeds on the hen,
And feathers are found on hogs;
When Thomas cats swim in the air,
And elephants roost upon trees;
When insects in summer are rare,
And snuff never makes people sneeze;
When the fish creep over dry land,
And mules on velocipedes ride;
When foxes lay eggs in the sand,
And women in dress take no pride;
When Dutchmen no longer drink beer,
And girls get to preaching on time;
When the billy goat butts from the rear,
And treason no longer is crime;
When the humming bird brays like an ass,
And limburger smells like cologne;
When plowshares are made out of glass,
And hearts of Tennesseans are stone;
When sense grows in Republican heads,
And wool on the hydraulic ram;
Then the Democratic party will be dead,
And this country not worth a d——n.

[Loud applause.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. On the same subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CURTIS). The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] may have leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] supplements that by modifying the request that it be upon the same subject. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I have not the lung power of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], and therefore I shall ask the House to listen to me for a few minutes. I will not try to make any fun, and I will try to impress upon the gentleman from Missouri a lesson in political discussion. I know his very great fairness in debate, for I have had a great many opportunities to learn it, but he has taken a little advantage to-night, or else he has misunderstood the logic of the argument which I made, I believe, in January last.

What was it that I was trying to establish—and the gentleman participated in it, as he always does in any speech that I make on the tariff question? I started out with the proposition and put it at the head of that speech, a defense of the author of the Republican platform of 1904, said to have been drafted by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and which declared in substance that whenever we had low tariff we had adversity and whenever we had high tariff we had prosperity. I said then that the statement was a fact underlying every proposition of American history on this vital question, and I say it now, and no man has successfully denied it. [Applause on the Republican side.] I took up the occasions one by one and brought forward the evidence of such writers as were available, and among the rest the statement of Mr. Blaine himself. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] then, as he had done on several other occasions, undertook to quote Mr. Blaine as having spoken in favor of or in vindication of the tariff of 1846. I made the answer at that time, which I have made a score of times in his presence, explaining how it was, in the very language of Mr. Blaine himself, that there was a seeming break in the chain of disaster following a low tariff in the United States.

With that we are all familiar, namely, that there had come the discovery of gold in California, which brought $800,000,000 in gold into circulation in the United States, and as I pointed out the night before last, I might have supplemented that by saying that under a Democratic Administration inside of ten years it all fled except two hundred millions. But I did not go into that branch of the subject. Coming along down to that period of time and to negative his argument which he attempted to support by the quotation from Mr. Blaine, I quoted from James Buchanan, President of the United States, not necessarily as having admitted, as he did not certainly do, that the tariff of 1846 had caused the terrific disaster of 1857, but showing that on each recurring low tariff period we had disaster and hard times, and I argued, first, to show that it was the war with Mexico and the discovery of gold in California that held back the disaster, but at last I showed that in the fall and winter of 1858 by the declaration of a Democratic President, the disaster did come, and I brought forward not as an admission of Mr. Buchanan that it was the tariff alone, or even in part, that brought the disaster, but as an admission of Mr. Buchanan that under a Democratic Administration and at a time when, I stated, we had a low tariff, we had the terrific disaster of 1857.

That is the whole argument, and I am not here to-night at this late period of this session of Congress to again open up and to again debate the whole subject of the tariff. I close where I began. What I stated in January I reiterate now, that there never has been a period of low tariff in the United States of America from the days of Washington to the days of Grover Cleveland that we did not have hard times. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, at this late hour and on this very warm night I will not attempt to discuss at length or in detail the failure of this Congress to pass much-needed legislation in the interests of the laboring classes of the country. I shall content myself with calling attention to some very important measures which have been urged in the interest of labor, and which, in my judgment, ought to have been long since enacted into law.

But recently there was delivered from the other side of this Chamber an address in which was set forth much of the legislation that has been enacted by this Congress. It was claimed that this legislation had added to the well-being of the country, and had conduced to the continued prosperity of the nation.

It would have been gratifying, indeed, if it could have been pointed out that the National Legislature had done something toward enacting laws which would have conduced to the interests of the laboring masses of the country, or which would have remedied some of the evils and abuses to which the workingmen of the Republic have been subjected.

The eight-hour bill, the enactment of which is demanded by the laboring element of the country, and which is a most just and meritorious measure, was allowed to slumber in the committee room until only a few days ago, when a favorable report upon it was made to the House. That report was made pursuant to the directions of the committee at its meeting in the latter part of May, at which meeting seven members of the committee attended, four being Democrats and three Republicans; and it was only through the action of this Democratic majority present that favorable consideration was secured.

Congress has been in session for six long months, during which time there has been any amount of discussion and ample opportunity to enact the eight-hour law. Within that period those favorable to labor have been unflagging in their endeavors to secure the passage of the bill. Members of this House on this side of the Chamber have urged its enactment. The American Federation of Labor, representing an enormous army of the toilers of the Republic, has been knocking at our doors, insisting upon and imploring for the passage of the bill.

Its able president, Mr. Gompers, and some of his coworkers were painstaking in their efforts and made clear and lucid and masterly arguments before the committee which should have gained favorable action.

Time and time again the numerous friends of labor urged the enactment of the bill, yet a deaf ear was turned to these demands. The majority in control of the committee allowed the bill to slumber. Under the tyrannical and despotic rules of the House the friends of the measure had no redress and could invoke no remedy known to the rules or the procedure of this body which could have secured favorable action on the bill or which could have secured its enactment.

At the closing hours of this session we find ourselves without opportunity to secure a vote upon the bill in the House; and so again the matter is permitted, through the action of the majority in control of this body, to be laid aside, and the purpose of the promoters of the measure is unjustly and grievously defeated.

I am a firm believer in the principles that underlie the eight-hour law. I have always been strongly in favor of an efficient and an effective eight-hour law and an advocate of the principles that underlie the demand for its enactment.

The present eight-hour law has been found ineffective and insufficient to accomplish the purpose of its designers and its framers. It has been in many instances evaded by the officers of the Government, and frequent and persistent violations of it have been allowed to pass without punishment or rebuke.

The Government of the United States should be the very first to set an example to private employers throughout the land through means of legislation that may plainly indicate that eight hours' labor shall constitute a fair day's work. The Government should insist upon all its work—whether done under the direct supervision of its own officers or done through contractors operating under contracts—being done in accordance with the principle that there shall be no more required of any employee than eight hours' labor in a day.

Considerations of public policy require the adoption of the eight-hour law. Only inordinate greed and selfish desire to enrich themselves at the expense of labor animate those who are opposed to the law in their opposition to the measure.

Aside from every other consideration that may be urged in favor of an eight-hour law, it may be truthfully said that the enactment of such a statute and its observance would be conducive to the welfare of the toiling citizen himself.

Considerations of personal comfort, to which every man is entitled by nature's law; consideration of the wellbringing up of family and the improvement of mind, as well as of body, combine to demand the application of the principles underlying the demand for an eight-hour law.

Economic conditions require the enactment of such a statute. A due regard for the advancement of the mental, moral, social and physical improvement of the laboring classes of the country makes the demand for the reduction of the hours of labor to eight hours per day both just and reasonable.

Commissioner Wright, writing on this subject as far back as in 1898, said:

> All such laws (meaning the eight-hour bill) are enacted for the purpose of taking the laboring man from the injurious effects of prolonged physical effort, giving him more time for his personal affairs and more time to devote to the cultivation of his moral and mental powers.

I also quote from the remarks of Mr. McKinley, made in the House in 1890, in the course of which, speaking upon the eight-hour law, he said:

> It must be remembered that when we constitute eight hours a day's work instead of ten hours, every four days give an additional day's work. To some workingman who may not have any employment at all it is one more day's work, one more day's wages, one more opportunity for work and wages, and increased demand for labor. * * * And the Government of the United States ought finally and in good faith to set this example of eight hours as constituting a day's work required of laboring men in the service of the United States. The tendency of the times the world over is for shorter hours for labor, shorter hours in the interest of health, shorter hours in the interest of humanity, shorter hours in the interest of the home and the family; and the United States can do no better service to labor and to its own citizens than to set the example to States, corporations, and to individuals employing men by declaring that, so far as the Government is concerned, eight hours shall constitute a day's work and be all that is required of its laboring force.

The eight-hour law should be so framed that it will not lie in the power of an administration, or of any officers of the Government, or of any contractor to evade its provisions or to nullify its beneficent effects.

I trust that at the next session of this Congress, which is to begin in the following December, the bill that has been reported through the action of the four Democrats of the Committee on Labor will be enacted into a law, and I repeat my regret that this Congress so far has been heedless and unmindful of the demand that has been made upon it for the enactment of the measure up to the present time.

The writ of injunction as it has been used and enforced in our Federal courts has been the subject of much abuse. In this respect, too, Congress has been deaf to the demands made, not only by the laboring element, but by the thousands and thousands of fair-minded citizens who have observed the usurpation of judicial power.

There ought to be no hesitation to enact legislation throwing around the citizen proper safeguards against the abuse to which this writ may be subjected. It has too frequently been made a mere machine to attack or destroy personal freedom. It has been made the instrument of gross usurpation of power by the courts, and against these dangers we ought carefully to guard by legislation.

In the last May number of the American Federationist, Mr. Andrew Furuseth, speaking on the subject of injunctions, well remarks:

Injunctions used contrary to and destructive of constitutional guaranties of individual freedom are usurpations, whether they take place in a monarchy by the king or in a republic by the judges. The power is the same, its results are the same, and the people that will endure will become serfs, will deteriorate, and die.

Time does not permit the pointing out of the outrageous manner in which some of the judges have abused their power in the issuance of injunctions and in the punishment for their alleged violation. The fact remains that workingmen have been tyrannized over in some jurisdictions through this abuse of the injunction writ and rendered helpless to assert their God-given right to work for whomsoever they pleased and wheresoever they would.

In an able and elaborate argument made by Thomas Carl Spelling, esq., of New York, before the Judiciary Committee of the House in support of the anti-injunction bill, Mr. Spelling makes a statement showing a startling example of the improper use of the injunction writ. He says in that argument:

But I feel that I would be remiss in the performance of duty if I did not give special attention to the conflict now waged in New York between the typothetæ and the typographical union, which the typothetæ's attorney, Mr. Bearry, told us about. I have with me the wage scale as presented to me by Mr. Frank Morrison, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, now in force in that city, and it reads as follows:

New York scale for book and job offices, March, 1905.

Compositors: Book and job scale, hand composition, 44 to 50 cents per thousand; per week, $21.
Proof readers: Per week, $21.
Floor men and "ad" men: Per week, $21.
Machine printers: Per week, $21.30.

You can scarcely realize the inadequacy of such wages if you have not lived in New York. Of the educational qualifications required of the employees I can not speak in detail, but they are very high. In short, each must be a man above the average in literary attainments. The most talented writers always expect the proof sheets to come back with a lot of query marks on the margin calling attention to rhetorical lapses to say nothing of the absolute correctness required in the matter of orthography and punctuation.

Well, of 7,000 of these, 700 are on strike for an eight-hour day. It seems that the Typothetæ have yielded to nine-tenths of the strikers. But they have a legal and a detective force on the heels of the 700. Nevertheless, the other 6,300 are lending aid to the 700. But with the lawyers and detectives and bullies always hired to insult and pick quarrels with strikers and afterwards to appear as witnesses against them, there have been eight convictions for assault. The attorney for the Typothetæ got an injunction and flaunted it here proudly and exultantly. The unfair judge who issued it was no doubt made to believe that the mere business of the complainant was property. But that was not enough to warrant the issuance of an injunction. To complete the fabricated basis for the infamous outrage which he perpetrated upon these poorly paid and overworked men, who are among the best citizens of New York, notwithstanding their poverty, he had to hold that the capitalists had a property interest in the unemployed in what he would term the "labor market." But owing to the brazen zeal and blind partisanship of the Typothetæ and their legal representative, the rapacity, unfairness, and overreaching greed of the Typothetæ was made to appear in a very strong light. He thought he had advanced a very telling argument when he said it was necessary to enforce a nine-hour day, which really means lower wages than an eight-hour day, in order to capture and hold in New York the book and job printing of the United States.

Again, Mr. Spelling very forcefully remarks:

I might recount to you at great length the abuses of Federal courts in the matter of sending forth what may be properly called special legislation—that is, they usurp the legislative power and make an ex post facto law and crush and destroy one side in a labor dispute. They turn over the judicial power that the Constitution and Congress has given for other purposes. They turn that over to one side in a trade dispute where vital and far-reaching interests are involved, and that side employs it as an unfair, a crushing and overwhelming advantage against what, despite its numbers, is the weaker adversary. And this legislation is sought in order to mark anew the dividing line between the jurisdiction in law and equitable jurisdiction.

I am mindful that heretofore some of my colleagues on the Democratic side have called attention to the communication made by the American Federation of Labor in respect to its appeal, and the indifference manifested by the Republican majority in the House toward labor's cause. I wish to emphasize labor's demands by calling attention again to that well-drawn and expressive document which ought to have received respectful heed, but which has so far had no effect upon our present Congress. That document, styled the "Bill of Grievances," is as follows:

LABOR'S GRIEVANCES.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 21, 1906.

Hon. THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States;
Hon. WM. P. FRYE,
President pro tempore United States Senate;
Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
Speaker House of Representatives, United States.

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned executive council of the American Federation of Labor, and those accompanying us in the presentation of this document, submit to you the subject-matter of the grievances which the workmen of our country feel by reason of the indifferent position which the Congress of the United States has manifested toward the just, reasonable, and necessary measures which have been before it these past several years, and which particularly affect the interests of the working people, as well as by reason of the administrative acts of the executive branches of this Government and the legislation of the Congress relating to these interests. For convenience, the matters of which we complain are briefly stated, and are as follows:

The law commonly known as the "eight-hour law" has been found ineffective and insufficient to accomplish the purpose of its designers and framers. Labor has, since 1894, urged the passage of a law so as to remedy the defects, and for its extension to all work done for or on behalf of the Government. Our efforts have been in vain.

Without hearing of any kind granted to those who are the advocates of the eight-hour law and principle, Congress passed, and the President signed, an appropriation bill containing a rider nullifying the eight-hour law and principle in its application to the greatest public work ever undertaken by our Government, the construction of the Panama Canal.

The eight-hour law in terms provides that those intrusted with the supervision of Government work shall neither require nor permit any violations thereof. The law has been grievously and frequently violated. The violations have been reported to the heads of several Departments, who have refused to take the necessary steps for its enforcement.

While recognizing the necessity for the employment of inmates of our penal institutions, so that they may be self-supporting, labor has urged in vain the enactment of a law that shall safeguard it from the competition of the labor of convicts.

In the interest of all of our people, and in consonance with their almost general demand, we have urged Congress for some tangible relief from the constantly growing evil of induced and undesirable immigration, but without result.

Recognizing the danger of Chinese immigration, and responsive to the demands of the people, Congress years ago enacted an effective Chinese-exclusion law; yet, despite the experience of the people of our own country, as well as those of other countries, the present law is flagrantly violated, and now by act of Congress it is seriously proposed to invalidate that law and reverse the policy.

The partial relief secured by the laws of 1895 and 1898, providing that seamen shall not be compelled to endure involuntary servitude, has been seriously threatened at each succeeding Congress. The petitions to secure for the seamen equal right with all others have been denied, and a disposition shown to extend to other workmen the system of compulsory labor.

Under the guise of a bill to subsidize the shipping industry, a provision is incorporated, and has already passed the Senate, providing for a term of conscription, which would make compulsory naval service a condition precedent to employment on privately owned vessels.

Having in mind the terrible and unnecessary loss of life attending the burning of the Slocum in the harbor of New York, the wreck of the Rio de Janeiro at the entrance to the bay of San Francisco, and other disasters on the waters too numerous to mention, in nearly every case the great loss of life was due to the undermanning and the unskilled manning of such vessels, we presented to Congress measures that would, if enacted, so far as human law could do, make impossible the awful loss of life. We have sought this remedy more in the interests of the traveling public than in that of the seamen, but in vain.

Having in mind the constanly increasing evil growing out of the parsimony of corporations, of towing several undermanned and unequipped vessels called "barges" on the high seas, where, in case of storm or stress, they are cut loose to drift or sink and their crews to perish, we have urged the passage of a law that shall forbid the towing of more than one such vessel unless they shall have an equipment and a crew sufficient to mange them when cut loose and sent adrift, but in vain.

The antitrust and interstate-commerce laws enacted to protect the people against monopoly in the products of labor and against discrimination in the transportation thereof, have been perverted, so far as the laborers are concerned, so as to invade and violate their personal liberty as guaranteed by the Constitution. Our repeated efforts to obtain redress from Congress have been in vain.

The beneficent writ of injunction, intended to protect property rights has, as used in labor disputes, been perverted so as to attack and destroy personal freedom and in a manner to hold that the employer has some property rights in the labor of the workman. Instead of obtaining the relief which labor has sought, it is seriously threatened with statutory authority for existing judicial usurpation.

The Committee on Labor of the House of Representatives was instituted at the demand of labor to voice its sentiments, to advocate its rights, and to protect its interests. In the past two Congresses this committee has been so organized as to make ineffectual any attempt labor has made for redress. This being the fact in the last Congress, labor requested the Speaker to appoint on the Committee on Labor members who, from their experience, knowledge, and sympathy, would render in this Congress such service as the committee was originally designed to perform. Not only was labor's request ignored, but the hostile make-up of the committee was accentuated.

Recently the President issued an order forbidding any and all Government employees, upon the pain of instant dismissal from the Government service, to petition Congress for any redress of grievances or for any improvement in their condition. Thus the constitutional right of citizens to petition must be surrendered by the Government employee in order that he may obtain or retain his employment.

We present these grievances to your attention because we have long, patiently, and in vain waited for redress. There is not any matter of which we have complained but for which we have in an honorable and lawful manner submitted remedies. The remedies for these grievances proposed by labor are in line with fundamental law, and with the progress and development made necessary by changed industrial conditions.

Labor brings these, its grievances, to your attention because you are the representatives responsible for legislation and for failure of legislation. The toilers come to you as your fellow-citizens who, by reason of their position in life, have not only with all other citizens an equal interest in our country, but the further interest of being the burden-bearers, the wage-earners of America. As labor's representatives we ask you to redress these grievances, for it is in your power so to do.

Labor now appeals to you, and we trust that it may not be in vain. But if perchance you may not heed us, we shall appeal to the conscience and the support of our fellow-citizens.

Very respectfully,

Samuel Gompers, James Duncan, James O'Connell, Max Morris, D. A. Hayes, Daniel J. Keefe, Wm. D. Huber, Joseph F. Valentine, John B. Lennon, Frank Morrison, executive council, American Federation of Labor.

Organized labor has accomplished much for the toiling masses of the Republic. Individual effort, however well directed, however valuable it may be, can never serve as great a purpose as organized effort made in the same direction.

Most of the reforms brought about in the several States of the Union and in the country itself, through the Federal Legislature, for the relief and for the benefit of the laboring and industrial classes, and which necessarily operate for the benefit of the entire people, have been brought about because of the urgent and repeated and persistent demands of organized labor.

It may well be asserted, as a general rule, that whatever operates to benefit the laboring classes of the country operates toward the benefit of all the people of the land. That which serves to uplift and upbuild the people who toil, goes to promote the general prosperity and welfare of the nation.

Labor in some way and in some form is a mighty contributor to the taxes and the revenue that flow into the Public Treasury. In its last analysis taxation falls upon labor itself.

Some years ago upon this floor I said, and I desire to repeat it now, that I agreed fully with a great writer on the subject, who declared that "Taxation reaches down to the base, but the base is labor, and labor pays all."

Hence it is the laboring man, it is the laboring element, it is the great army of those who toil and sweat, those who produce something through their genius, their brawn, or brain, who stand at the portals of Congress demanding remedial legislation as citizens of the Republic. They come—as they have a right to come—in their dual capacity as citizens and as taxpayers, as men who contribute by their labor, their thrift, their industry, and their work to the general welfare of the country.

In these closing hours of Congress, no appeal, of course, can be productive of results at this session; but I deem it a duty, as well as I esteem it a pleasure, to stand here to lend my voice in aid of labor's demand for such legislation as may contribute to the welfare of the vast army of toilers and wage-earners of the land.

The Republican majority of this House, in whose power it was to pass the legislation necessary for the proper protection of labor, must remember that in the end they must all answer to the people at the polls. Every Member of this House will in a few months more be called upon to render unto his constituency an account of his stewardship. When that time comes, the laboring man, the wage-earner, the toiler, as well as the rest of our citizenship, under the protection of the Constitution of the Republic, will exercise his sovereign right as a citizen in the selection of Representatives to sit in the Congress of the United States.

Let them then choose between those who have been indifferent to their demands on the one hand and those who have been friendly to them on the other.

From the Democratic side of the Chamber, with a consistency that has always marked the Democratic party in standing for the interests of the masses of the country, have come earnest appeals for remedial labor legislation. From the other side of the Chamber has come the silence that tells of indifference and opposition.

Let those who had it in their power to enact legislation for the common good, for the toilers of the country, for the wage-earners of the land, remember that they will be held responsible for their inaction by the people. When the test shall be made—as it must be made—at the polls, let those in the ranks of labor, let those who are the honest friends of labor, those who realize that—

> Princes and kings may flourish and may fade;
> A breath has made them, as a breath can make;
> But a bold working class, their country's pride,
> When once destroyed can never be supplied—

judge those for whom they are to cast their suffrage, not by promises or by empty professions, but by their deeds; by the evidences they have given of their steadfastness of purpose and of their sincerity of action.

RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 72.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 72. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. 72) fixing the date upon which the act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, approved June —, 1896, shall go into effect.

Resolved, etc., That the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," shall take effect and be in force sixty days after its approval by the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I now move to amend the title.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment amending the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the title by striking out all after the word "June," in line 5, and insert the following: "29, 1906, shall go into effect."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the title.

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2668. An act to regulate the retirement of certain veterans of the civil war;

S. 2699. An act for the relief of Robert F. Scott;

S. 5868. An act changing the names of Brightwood avenue and Georgia avenue; and

S. 6468. An act ceding certain land appertaining to the post-office building at Reno, Nev., for use as a street.

PAYMENT OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES.

Mr. SOUTHWICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay, from the contingent fund of the House, to the persons employed, respectively, as Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms in charge of pairs, clerk in charge of pairs, and the special chief page, designated as a "Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms," the difference between the compensation now paid them by law at the rate of $1,400 per annum and the rate of $1,600 per annum until the end of the present fiscal year or until otherwise provided for by law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know if that resolution has been reported from any committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands not.

Mr. BARTLETT. Well, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that resolution and another resolution looking to increasing the pay of various employees of the House have been before the Committee on Accounts and have been considered by them and have not been reported. Now, while I have no objection to permit the House to consider the question of increasing the pay of its employees, if it desires to do so, I do not think that certain employees ought to be singled out to the exclusion of others. There are other resolutions pending asking for an increase to other employees of the House.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. What clerks are these?

Mr. BARTLETT. They are three pair clerks.

Mr. SULZER. Why not take them all in?

Mr. BARTLETT. That is my proposition exactly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. There are two more?

Mr. BARTLETT. There are three more.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia object?

Mr. SULZER. I move to amend by taking in the other three clerks.

The SPEAKER. Why, it is unanimous consent to consider this resolution.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend that this shall be considered in this way, familiar as I am with what was done in the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objects.

DIGEST OF CUSTOMS LAWS AND DECISIONS.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution authorizing the purchase of the manuscript of a digest of the United States customs laws and decisions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a rereading of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to purchase from the legal owners thereof, at a cost not to exceed $2,000, payable out of any funds not otherwise appropriated, the manuscript of a digest of the United States customs laws and decisions, compiled by Robert M. Cousar, deceased, and to have printed, with such revision as in his judgment may be necessary, not to exceed 1,000 copies for the official use of the Treasury Department. And the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for said purpose. And the Superintendent of Documents is hereby authorized to reprint this document for sale at $2 per copy.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS] for information as to the ownership of this manuscript at the present time.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. This manuscript was prepared by a gentleman named Robert Cousar, and it is now——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. And it is now in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. TAWNEY. Has it been printed?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. It has never been printed. I would say that no digest of the decisions of the courts and the board of appraisers for the period covered by this manuscript has ever been printed. This particular period has never been covered. And the Secretary of the Treasury and the board of appraisers have earnestly recommended this publication.

Mr. TAWNEY. Has the Secretary of the Treasury recommended it?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Very strongly.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have read a telegram from the Secretary of the Treasury in response to one I sent this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 29, 1906.

Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE,
House of Representatives.:

The Coursar's manuscript of digest of customs decisions was reliable and valuable when made. The author is dead and the work needs bringing up to date. The Department has, in fact, used it for a few years, and I think it is due the widow that we buy the manuscript for $1,000 at least.

L. M. SHAW.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, this resolution provides for paying $2,000 for this manuscript. In the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury not to exceed $1,000 should be paid.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One thousand at least.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the resolution at that rate.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say, Mr. Speaker, in the light of that telegram, that the value of this manuscript, as given to the Committee on Printing, was placed in the sum that is carried in the joint resolution, and our information as to its value came from the Treasury Department.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20403) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the bill (H. R. 20410) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6338. An act to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the diocese of Washington;"

S. 4317. An act to provide for the payment of certain claims against the District of Columbia in accordance with the act of Congress approved January 26, 1897, and as amended July 19, 1897; and

S. 5565. An act to close certain alleys in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the conferees on the bill (H. R. 20410) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes, be directed to add to said bill an item of $100,000 toward the construction of a public building at Albuquerque, N. Mex.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 4317. An act to provide for the payment of certain claims against the District of Columbia in accordance with the act of Congress approved January 26, 1897, and as amended July 19, 1897—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 5565. An act to close certain alleys in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 6338. An act to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Diocese of Washington—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 15442. An act to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States;

H. R. 14396. An act to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, to define the powers thereof, and to facilitate interstate commerce;

PUBLIC BUILDING BILL.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report and ask that the House agree to the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there a statement with the report?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. And I desire to ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that instead of a written statement I may be permitted to make an oral report and statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] presents a conference report on the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read the title.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20410) entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 7, 8, 9, 10, 23, 28, 34, 36, 37, 41, 42, 46, 47, 48, 52, 55, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 65, 66, 68, 69, 74, 79, 80, 82, 89, 93, 97, 98, 109, 121, 123, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 145, 148, 156, 157, and 158.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 4, 6, 12, 13, 15, 16, 18, 19, 20, 22, 24, 25, 26, 29, 31, 32, 33, 35, 39, 43, 45, 49, 51, 53, 56, 57, 64, 67, 71, 72, 75, 76, 85, 86, 87, 88, 90, 91, 94, 95, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 107, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 122, 124, 125, 126, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 147, 154, 160, and 162; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 44: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 44, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "post-office" insert the words "and court-house;" strike out the words "government buildings" and insert in lieu thereof the words "governmental offices;" so that said section shall read as follows:

"United States post-office and court-house and other governmental offices at San Juan, Porto Rico, three hundred thousand dollars."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 50: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "hundred" insert the words "and twenty;" so that said section shall read as follows:

"United States post-office, custom-house, and land office at Eureka, California, one hundred and twenty thousand dollars."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 73: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 73, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "sixty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty-five;" so that said section shall read as follows:

"United States post-office at Manistee, Michigan, fifty-five thousand dollars."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 77: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 77, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "one hundred and fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the words "two hundred;" so that said item shall read as follows:

"United States post-office, court-house, and land office at Great Falls, Montana, two hundred thousand dollars."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 78: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 78, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "eighty-five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eighty;" so that same shall read as follows:

"United States post-office at Kearney, Nebraska, eighty thousand dollars."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 81: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 81, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "sixty-five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "seventy;" so that same shall read as follows:

"United States post-office at Olean, New York, seventy thousand dollars."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 83: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 83, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "seventy," making said amendment read as follows:

"United States post-office at Yonkers, New York, one hundred and seventy thousand dollars."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 96: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 96, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "seventy-five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eighty," making said amendment read as follows:

"United States post-office and other governmental offices at Lead, South Dakota, eighty thousand dollars."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 106: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 106, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "post-office" insert the words "and court-house;" so that said amendment shall read as follows:

"United States post-office and court-house at Sheridan, Wyoming, one hundred and fifty thousand dollars."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 153: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 153, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 42 of the bill, after line 7, insert the following:

"SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a suitable site for the United States post-office and other governmental offices at Oklahoma City, Territory of Okalahoma: Provided, That thirty thousand dollars of the fifty thousand dollars heretofore appropriated for the acquisition of a suitable site and the erection and completion of a building thereon at said city shall be available for the acquisition, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, of a site only at Oklahoma City, Territory of Oklahoma."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 155: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 155, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 42 of the bill, line 18, after the word "condemnation," insert the words "or otherwise;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 138: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 138, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 139: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 139, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifteen;" and the Senate agree to the same.

And disagree on the following amendments, numbered 5, 11, 14, 17, 21, 27, 30, 38, 40, 54, 58, 70, 108, 120, 146, and 159.

RICHARD BARTHOLDT,
EDWIN C. BURLEIGH,
J. H. BANKHEAD,
Managers on the part of the House.

N. B. SCOTT,
F. E. WARREN,
C. A. CULBERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that in lieu of a written statement he may make a verbal statement, and also to dispense with the reading of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, the conferees of the two Houses on the public building bill agree on all the items contained in that bill except fourteen items, which are as follows:

The New York custom-house; the New York assay office; Detroit (Mich.) post-office; Columbus (Ohio) post-office; Chattanooga post-office building; Cedar Rapids, Mich.; Oklawaha, Fla.; Des Moines, Iowa; Fernandina, Fla.; Moscow, Idaho; Denver, Colo.; Minneapolis, Minn., and Richmond, Va., and last, but not least, the three-million-dollar proposition which contemplates the purchase of two blocks of land in the District of Columbia for the purpose of erecting a Department building.

The opinion of the conferees of the House is that there will be no difficulty in agreeing upon all these items. We would like to get the judgment of the House upon the main proposition, which has proved a stumbling block in our conference, namely, the $3,000,000 proposition. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to get the judgment of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand that there is an agreement on all except the item specified? If so, the first thing to do would be to dispose of the report.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I move to adopt the report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken; and the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I move to further insist on the disagreement of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments in disagreement, as specified, and ask for further conference.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman now desire to agree to the further conference requested by the Senate?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the request of the Senate for a conference will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House that the conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to House bill 20410 do not agree to Senate amendment numbered 159, being an appropriation for the purchase of a site in the District of Columbia, at a cost of $3,000,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, in support of that resolution I wish to state to the House that there is no doubt of the correctness of the statement of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] that this proposition, to appropriate $3,000,000 for the purchase of a site for a departmental building, is the principal if not the sole obstacle in the way of agreement between the two Houses. I confidently believe that if the House will adopt this resolution by a large majority, as I believe it will, the work of the conferees will be materially facilitated, and an agreement will be brought about much earlier than could otherwise be accomplished. And, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say further that in view of the construction that we have heretofore authorized here in the District of Columbia during the last four years, as compared with the construction authorized in the remainder of the United States, there is no justification whatever for our appropriating a dollar at this session for the construction of any new building in this city.

We have to-day in course of construction in this city eleven public buildings. All of them have been authorized since June 6, 1902. The limit of cost of those eleven buildings is $18,051,300. During that same time Congress has authorized the construction of buildings throughout the remainder of the United States in an amount aggregating $24,504,809. The unappropriated balance of the $18,000,000 heretofore authorized for construction in this city equals the aggregate amount carried in the sundry civil bill at this session of Congress for all other public-building construction throughout the Union. That being the case, Mr. Speaker, I can see no justification whatever for our now appropriating $3,000,000 for the purchase of this site, which means an ultimate expenditure for public buildings that will aggregate at least $12,000,000, if not $15,000,000, and thus prevent the appropriation of money for the erection of buildings in other parts of the United States, where buildings are just as essential as they are in the District of Columbia. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I call for a division, in order that we may have a count on this vote.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 225, noes none.

Accordingly the resolution was agreed to.

The announcement of the result was received with applause.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a statement concerning the public buildings in the District of Columbia now under construction, to which I have referred.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the request will be granted.

The statement is as follows:

	Limit of cost.	Appropriations to date.	Appropriations this session.	Balance.
Municipal building	$2,500,000	$1,450,000	$500,000	$550,000
Police court building	75,000	75,000
National Museum building	3,500,000	1,750,000	500,000	1,250,000
Agricultural Department building	1,500,000	950,000	300,000	250,000
Hall of Records	2,000,000	5,000		1,955,000
Addition to Post-Office Department building	400,000	400,000
Power house for Capitol and other buildings	926,300	493,000		433,300
Office building, House of Representatives	3,100,000	2,300,000	500,000	300,000
Office building, United States Senate	2,250,000	1,330,000		920,000
New Union Station	1,500,000	1,500,000
Total	17,751,300	10,253,000	1,800,000	5,658,300
Freedmen's Hospital	300,000
Total	18,051,300

During the same period, since June 6, 1902, public buildings have been authorized throughout the United States and outside of the District of Columbia at a total cost of only $24,504,809.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. BARTHOLDT, Mr. BURLEIGH, and Mr. BANKHEAD.

PUBLIC BUILDING, ALBUQUERQUE, N. MEX.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the resolution passed by the Senate a few minutes ago, in relation to the public building at Albuquerque, N. Mex.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for present consideration of the following concurrent resolution of the Senate, which the Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE, June 29, 1906.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the conferees on the bill (H. R. 20410) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes, be directed to add to said bill an item of $100,000 toward the construction of a public building at Albuquerque, N. Mex.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

APPROPRIATION FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAWNEY. At the beginning of the session this evening both Houses adopted a concurrent resolution instructing the conferees on the general deficiency bill to include in their final report appropriations for the public buildings authorized in the public building bill, which is now in conference between the two Houses, after agreement had been reached. Now, if this report on the general deficiency bill is agreed to, in what manner then will the appropriation be cared for?

The SPEAKER. Did the Senate pass the concurrent resolution?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

The SPEAKER. And subsequently agreed to the conference report on the deficiency bill, and that is the final report. If the Chair may suggest to the gentleman, if the report is agreed to the engrossment and enrollment of the bill could be completed, and the Chair will suggest to the gentleman for his consideration that when the public-building bill is reported that perhaps the easiest and shortest way would be a deficiency bill that would cover the items in the public-building bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Very well; I simply wanted the House to understand the situation.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the general deficiency bill, and ask that the report be read. There is no statement. It is a general agreement on all the items.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 20403) making appropriations to supply deficiencies, and asks unanimous consent that the report only be read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R.

20403) making appropriations to supply the deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 9, 12, 15, 16, 21, 24, 38, 39, 52, 53, 54, and 94.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 13, 14, 17, 18, 19, 20, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 50, 51, 55, 56, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, and 93, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of said amendment strike out the word "day;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 57: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lines 7 and 8 of said amendment omit the words ", to be expended only for service rendered in the District of Columbia;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 69: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 69, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 12 of said amendment, after the word "Numbered," insert "Five hundred and twelve;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 95: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 95, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of said amendment, after the word "China," insert "to be available during the fiscal year nineteen hundred and seven;" and the Senate agree to the same.

The conference report was agreed to.

PUBLICATION OF DIGEST OF UNITED STATES CUSTOMS LAWS AND DECISIONS.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. This afternoon, as chairman of the Committee on Printing, I presented a joint resolution providing for the publication of a digest of United States customs laws and decisions. To my request for unanimous consent the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] objected. Later I went to Mr. PAYNE and asked him the basis of his objection. He stated that he did not think the publication was justified. I told him it was recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. He said he thought it must have been recommended by the Secretary without due consideration, and said he would telegraph the Secretary of the Treasury for information on the subject.

Before the House took recess I went to Mr. PAYNE again and asked him if he had received an answer to his telegram, and he said he had not, and that in his opinion his telegram had reached the Department after the Department had closed.

I then explained the matter further, and he stated that he would not object if I again asked for the consideration of the joint resolution. Relying upon his statement, and receiving no information whatever in relation to the telegram read, I again offered the joint resolution, and asked unanimous consent for its consideration. I was very much surprised indeed when the gentleman from New York arose and sent to the Clerk's desk the telegram from the Secretary of the Treasury, which has just been read in the hearing of the House. In view of the reading of the telegram I ask that the following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, under date of January 8, 1906, be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 8, 1906.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON PRINTING,
House of Representatives.

SIR: On February 6, 1902, a joint resolution (143) "to provide for the printing of a digest of the United States customs laws and decisions" was introduced by Mr. Metcalf, and referred to your committee. A similar joint resolution was introduced by Mr. LANDIS during the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress. These resolutions provide in effect for the printing of a stated number of copies of a digest prepared by Robert M. Cousar, and appropriate a sum not to exceed $3,000 in payment therefor.

This is the only digest known to the Department that is so arranged that the decisions of the courts and the Board of United States General Appraisers appear under the respective paragraphs of the tariff.

I am of the opinion that this digest brought down to January 1, 1904, when the Department began the publication in "Treasury Decisions" of court cases, would be useful in the administration of the customs laws, and have the honor to recommend that provision be made for its completion and editorial supervision by such person or persons as may be designated by this Department, $1,000 of the $3,000 appropriated to be paid for this work, and the balance of $2,000 to be paid to the widow of Mr. Cousar.

Respectfully, L. M. SHAW, Secretary.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, in the light of this letter and telegram, was either too high in January or too low in June. I would call the attention of the House to the fact that in his letter the Secretary of the Treasury recommends an appropriation of $3,000 for this publication. The Committee on Printing conferred with the Treasury Department with special reference to the $1,000 asked for bringing the publication down to date and received the assurance that if we would make an appropriation of $2,000 the work would be brought down to date by the Treasury Department, and it would cost the Government nothing. Upon that representation and at the urgent request of the chief of the customs division the Committee on Printing presented this joint resolution. I would say in addition that the Committee on Printing was visited on several occasions by members of the Board of Appraisers of New York City, urging the speedy passage of this joint resolution.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I don't know exactly what fault the gentleman is finding with me. I went out and telegraphed, as I agreed, to the Department. I received word that the Department was closed and they could not get any answer. Subsequently I did receive a telegram from the Western Union Telegraph Company, which telegram was read here. I thought it ought to go in for the information of the House. I have no apologies whatever to make for it.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I would say that I am not asking the gentleman for any apologies, but I think, in view of the fact that he knew I was going to call up this joint resolution again and ask for unanimous consent to consider it, and in view of the assurance that he had given me, he ought to have informed me of the receipt of that telegram.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman that I received the telegram after I went to my dinner. I came back here and almost immediately the gentleman attempted to call up his resolution, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objected.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to a question?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will.

The SPEAKER. This colloquy is proceeding by unanimous consent. Is there objection to its proceeding further? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman has possibly misinterpreted the telegram. When the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS] asked unanimous consent for its consideration at one time this evening I objected. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] showed me the telegram, and it was after that that I stated I would withdraw my objections.

The telegram from the Secretary of the Treasury to the gentleman from New York refers only to the manuscript eight years back, whereas the $2,000 provided for in the resolution presented by the gentleman from Indiana, as I understand it, provides for bringing the manuscript down to date, so that the digest comes down to dat , and while the Secretary of the Treasury states that $1,000 is the value of the manuscript as it stands, he still adheres to his original opinion that it will require $1,000 to bring it down to date.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. The gentleman is in error. The sum of money recommended by the committee contemplates payment to the widow, and there will be no cost whatever for bringing the digest down to date. The $3,000 recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury contemplated that $2,000 of that should go to the widow and a thousand dollars of it toward bringing it down to date.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Indiana still does not understand the position I call his attention to. While the resolution contemplates paying the widow the $2,000, it also contemplates that the widow or some one acting for her shall bring the digest down to date to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that assurances have already been given that the Department will bring it down to date, and there will be no cost whatever to the Government.

Mr. MANN. That is what I say; that it is covered by the $2,000, whereas the telegram to the gentleman from New York did not refer to bringing it down to date. So that there is no conflict here at all.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to one other thing, and that is that the telegram said it was worth at least $1,000.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON. Was the gentleman who prepared this digest in the employ of the Treasury Department when he prepared it?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I could not say whether he was or not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

The question was taken; and the resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

RECESS.

Then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE (at 12 o'clock and 19 minutes a. m.), the House took a recess until 10 o'clock and 55 minutes a. m. to-day.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of the harbor of San Juan, P. R., was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia, from the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. By Mr. SOUTHARD: Petition of Board of Trade of Chicago, for Government inspection of meat packing products—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of Tri County Bulletin, Grand Rapids, Ohio, for amendment of postal laws making legal all paper subscriptions—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. SULZER: Petition of New York State commission to the Jamestown Tercentennial Exposition—to the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions.

Also, petition of the New Immigrants' Protective League, against the Dillingham-Gardner bill—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, June 30, 1906.

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by Rev. JOHN VAN SCHAICK, Jr., of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. BURROWS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

SENATOR FROM UTAH.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I ask permission to make a brief statement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. BURROWS. When the Committee on Privileges and Elections made its report in the matter of the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] it was the desire and purpose of the committee to bring the matter before the Senate and dispose of it at the present session. The public business, however, has been so pressing and the necessity of passing the usual appropriation bills before the close of the fiscal year so urgent, and owing to the great importance of the questions involved in the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, it has been impossible to bring it to the attention of the Senate.

I desire to give notice that as it is a privileged matter, I shall call it up on the first day of the session in December, and ask the Senate to proceed with it to its conclusion.

ISTHMIAN EXPOSITION AT TAMPA, FLA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which was read:

Whereas it is fitting that the commencement of the work on the Panama Canal should be celebrated in a suitable manner to the end that the importance of this great isthmian waterway may be accentuated and the sentiment in favor of its early completion fostered and kept alive; and

Whereas the city of Tampa, in the State of Florida, by reason of its being farther to the southward and nearer to said canal than any other city in the country, having a deep and commodious harbor, reached by ample railroad facilities, as also on account of its salubrious climate and the spirit of American progress among its citizens, manifest in the rapid growth and development of the city and her commerce, affords a suitable place for such an exhibition; and

Whereas it has been determined to hold such an exposition at Tampa, Fla., during the months of January, February, March, April, and May, A. D. 1908; and

Whereas his excellency, Napoleon B. Broward, governor of the State of Florida, did on the 30th day of December, 1905, issue his proclamation calling an isthmian exposition to be held in the city of Tampa, commencing in the month of January, A. D. 1908, for the purpose aforesaid, and inviting the governors of the several States comprising the United States of America, as well as the governors of the Territories of the United States, to secure the cooperation of their State legislatures in aid of said exposition by participating therein and sending exhibits of their resources to said exposition: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to hold a naval review in Tampa Bay at such time during the progress of said exposition as he may deem best.

Resolved further, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to cause to be made such display of the Army of the United States at said exposition as he may deem advisable.

Resolved further, That nothing contained in this concurrent resolution shall be construed as committing the United States to any obligation hereafter to appropriate money for expenses or liabilities of any kind or character made or incurred by anyone for the entertainment of the guests of such exposition, or in connection with such celebration and exhibition.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HALE. I want to see what the language is, because I do not want to have the Government committed to any more expositions. Is there any clause in it providing that there shall be no call on the Government? If there is not, I shall have to object.

Mr. MALLORY. It does not commit the Government.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The last clause of the concurrent resolution provides that—

Nothing contained in this concurrent resolution shall be construed as committing the United States to any obligation hereafter to appropriate money for expenses or liabilities of any kind or character made or incurred by anyone for the entertainment of the guests of such exposition, or in connection with such celebration and exhibition.

Mr. HALE. We will try to keep to that if possible.

Mr. KEAN. It is a good beginning.

Mr. HALE. Everybody is very tired of these expositions.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, I am very glad to support this resolution, as I desire to offer a resolution at the next session of Congress providing for an international exposition at Los Angeles, Cal., to commemorate the completion of the Panama Canal in 1915. [Laughter.]

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE AT SOUTH OMAHA, NEBR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 17972) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River at or near South Omaha, Nebr.

Mr. NELSON. That bill was read last night. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JUNCTION CITY POST, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 177) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish a bronze cannon, with its carriage, limber, and accessories, to Junction City Post, No. 132, Grand Army of the Republic, department of Kansas.

Mr. LONG. The joint resolution was read last night. I ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS H. KENT.

The bill (H. R. 8825) for the relief of Thomas H. Kent was read the first time by its title.

Mr. CARTER. A similar bill was reported favorably from the committee, and it is recommended by the Department. I ask for its consideration.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money now in his hands or hereafter received from the sale of Crow lands in Montana, to Thomas H. Kent, of Sweet Grass County, Mont., the sum of $2,007.20, for the reimbursement to the said Thomas H. Kent for money actually expended by him in causing to be made the survey known as the "Bundock survey," within the boundaries of land ceded by the Crow Indians in Montana, to the United States, under treaty dated August 27, 1892, a map or plat of said survey having heretofore been filed in the Office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and marked "11622, Indian Office."

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 19750. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenues," approved June 10, 1890, as amended by the act entitled "An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States," approved July 24, 1897, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

RAILROAD IN ALASKA.

H. R. 18891. An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph and telephone line in the district of Alaska was read twice by its title.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred, without objection, to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. The bill belongs to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think the bill should go to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. NELSON. It goes to the Committee on Territories. That committee has had jurisdiction of all such measures.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Upon what theory does the Senator from Minnesota claim that the bill should be referred to the Committee on Territories?

Mr. NELSON. Because it relates to the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It is an appropriation of public land, and it has been the uniform custom of the Senate and the rule of Congress that all bills appropriating public lands should go to the Committee on Public Lands. I insist that the bill which came out of the Committee on Territories providing for a special charter for a railroad and which has been up for consideration here several times should have gone to the Committee on Public Lands originally.

Mr. NELSON. All bills relating to Alaska have gone to the Committee on Territories. There have been several railroad bills before that committee at every session since I have been here. They have all gone to the Committee on Territories.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that such has been the practice.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. I agree with the Senator from North Dakota. The Committee on Public Lands has always had the control of bills of this character. This bill proposes to appropriate a certain quantity of public lands to this railroad company. I do not think it pertains to Territories at all, but the Public Lands Committee has always had bills relating to grants of public land in Alaska and everywhere else. It seems to me the bill belongs to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The original act granting a right of way to railroad companies in Alaska was considered by the Public Lands Committee and reported out of that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota move to refer the bill to the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. NELSON. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Territories. We have had all the railroad bills pertaining to Alaska before that committee.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do not care, of course, to be obstinate on this question, because the Committee on Public Lands has all the work it can do. There have been some 125 or 130 bills referred to that committee. I simply desire to say that there is no doubt that all bills of this character making grants of public lands have heretofore been referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and to that committee I think this bill ought to go.

I move to lay the motion of the Senator from Minnesota on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota moves to lay the motion of the Senator from Minnesota on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. BERRY. I move to strike out "Territories," in the motion, and to insert "Public Lands."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that it is not according to the rules to amend a motion to refer. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to refer the bill to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact filed by the court in the cause of the Vestry of St. Luke's Episcopal Church, of Remington, Va., v. The United States; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

COAL AND COAL LANDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, transmitting, in response to the resolution of the 29th instant, a statement giving the contracts for the purchase of coal to be used by the Post-Office Department during the present fiscal year; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in response to the resolution of the 29th instant, a statement showing the contracts entered into by the Department of Justice for coal for use by that Department for the present fiscal year, and also for he fiscal year 1907; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 72) fixing the date upon which the act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, approved June —, 1906, shall go into effect, with an amendment to the title; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20403) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20410) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes, further insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 11, 14, 17, 21, 27, 30, 38, 40, 54, 58, 70, 108, 120, 146, and 159, agrees to the further conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BARTHOLDT, Mr. BURLEIGH, and Mr. BANKHEAD managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 183) providing for the printing of reports ordered by the river and harbor act of March 3, 1905; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate directing the conferees on the public-buildings bill to add to said bill an item of appropriation of $100,000 for the construction of a public building at Albuquerque, N. Mex.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 6209) authorizing certain changes in the permanent system of highways in the District of Columbia; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

INVESTIGATION OF AFFAIRS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. KEAN. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] on March 1, 1906, to report a substitute therefor. I ask for the present consideration of the proposed substitute.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed substitute will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee consisting of five Senators be appointed to fully investigate all matters connected with the condition of affairs in the Indian Territory in relation to legislation included in an act entitled "An act to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved April 26, 1906, and kindred matters in said Territory with reference to the Five Civilized Tribes, and that said committee be authorized to employ a stenographer to report its hearings, and all necessary clerical assistance; and said committee is authorized to sit in the city of Washington and in the Indian Territory, or elsewhere, as circumstances may demand, with power to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths, and shall make full and complete report, together with their conclusions and recommendations, to the Senate of the United States on the first Monday in December, A. D. 1906. The necessary expenses of said committee shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution just read?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, for myself I wish to understand what is the purpose of the resolution. I have a pretty definite idea that it will accomplish no good. We have admitted that country as a State, and I do not understand what business Congress now has with a committee down there while those people are preparing for statehood.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from Texas will remember that at the time the Five Civilized Tribes bill was under consideration in this body at the present session it developed a deplorable ignorance as to all matters affecting the legislation then pending.

While it is true that an enabling act has been passed for Oklahoma and Indian Territory, it is also true that the tribal relations still exist in the Indian Territory. The lands have not yet been allotted. There are questions of alienation, there are questions of citizenship, there are questions of the disposal of the property of the Indian tribes, and the Indians, upon which Congress ought to be fully advised.

I believe it was the unanimous sentiment at that time that some information ought to be furnished to the Senate which would serve as a basis for intelligent action upon matters connected therewith.

Mr. BAILEY. I have frequently realized that it was a positive misfortune that the Congress did not possess more accurate and more abundant information in respect to the conditions in the Indian Territory. I have seen the Senate repeatedly do what I felt sure it would not have done if it had thoroughly understood the conditions in that country. But the trouble is, we have about completed our legislation with respect to it, and it looks to me now like seeking information after the fight. But if the Committee on Indian Affairs thinks this is a proper resolution, I shall not oppose my single objection to the combined wisdom of the committee charged especially to deal with it.

However, I will say in passing that unless this committee learns more about the Indian Territory in this investigation than it has heretofore learned from the people who come here and who testify and make statements before the committee, it will be a waste of time and money.

I shall not, myself, do more than vote against the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution which has been read.

The resolution was not agreed to.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON RULES.

Mr. KEAN. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] on the 14th instant, to report it favorably with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an assistant clerk, in lieu of the messenger authorized by the resolution of January 4, 1906, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $1,800 per annum until otherwise provided by law.

The amendment of the committee was, to add at the end of the resolution "to take effect July 1, 1906."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

DAVID UPHAM.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 18545) granting an increase of pension to David Upham, to report it without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of David Upham, late of Company I, Ninth Regiment Kansas Volunteer Cavalry, and to pay him a pension of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET MUNSON.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 19163) granting an increase of pension to Margaret Munson, to report it without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Margaret Munson, widow of William H. Munson, late of Company B, Fourteenth Regiment Vermont Volunteer Infantry, and to pay her a pension of $16 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY A. CONANT.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 19241) granting an increase of pension to Henry A. Conant, to report it without amendment; and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Henry A. Conant, late of Company I, First Regiment Ohio Volunteers, war with Mexico, and to pay him a pension of $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANDREW LEOPOLD.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 19926) granting an increase of pension to Andrew Leopold, to report it without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Andrew Leopold, late of Company B, Thirty-eighth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (S. 6554) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Rock Springs, in the State of Wyoming; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6555) for the relief of Richard A. Proctor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MILLARD introduced a bill (S. 6556) to reimburse certain persons for the preparation of an analytical index to testimony taken before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

MALINDA S. GRAY.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1473) for the relief of Malinda S. Gray.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to Malinda S. Gray, widow of the late Frederick S. Gray, the sum of $356.10, the same being in lieu of check issued and returned to the Government by Frederick S. Gray.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senate to have patience, and to state that as soon as the report can be written up by the clerks the conferees on the public buildings bill have agreed on a report, which will be presented.

It was with great reluctance, Mr. President, that your conferees were compelled to yield on what to them was a very important—one of the most important amendments that the Senate committee had placed in the bill. I refer to section 24, or the so-called "site for the Departments of Justice, Commerce and Labor, and State Department." That measure had passed the Senate by a unanimous vote and your conferees felt that they were expected to stand to the last minute and retain that provision in the bill; but yet, as I said, we had reluctantly to abandon it.

Mr. President, it is with humiliation, if not shame, that I have to make this statement. When the two Houses of Congress make appropriations for buying sites for putting up public buildings all over the country in small cities and towns, and when we are erecting two magnificent buildings within the shadow of the Capitol for the comfort and convenience of ourselves, yet we allow the two great Departments of this Government to go uncared for and without a roof over their heads, housed in rented buildings, ill adapted for conducting the business of these Departments and certainly very inconvenient to those who have to conduct these branches of our Government.

And, Mr. President, another thing: If we were doing business as business men would act for themselves, this would not be a condition existing for any length of time.

The rents that are being paid for the buildings that house these two great Departments are five or six times the interest on the money that would be required to put up magnificent buildings.

Then, Mr. President, in addition to that, if I had my way Washington would not only be, as she is now, perhaps, one of the most beautiful cities of the world, but I would make her still more beautiful until she would be the admiration of all civilized countries. I would buy every foot of available land that I thought the Government would need for years to come, and I would allow future generations, by the issuing of a long-time bond, to pay for these improvements and beautifications, which will cost less to-day than they ever will again, because every day increases the value of the property in the capital city or our country. The Washington Times recently contained the following appropriate reference to this matter:

The Government's borrowing rate is about 1.9 per cent. It pays annually as rental for the District National Guard about $12,000. The rent bill is, therefore, the interest on $631,570. Without taking into account the loss to the Government through the use of inadequate quarters, the scattering of its offices, and waste time, the construction of a National Guard building at any figure less than $631,570 would be a measure of practical economy.

But the provision in the omnibus public building bill does not go even that far. It carries no appropriation whatever. It provides merely that Armory Square shall be dedicated for use as the site of a National Guard building and authorizes three officials of the Government, already under salary, to prepare plans and specifications for the building. Wherein the elimination of this item from the measure reduces its total would be hard to determine.

What has been said of the National Guard building is more impressively true of the $3,000,000 item carried in the sundry civil bill for the purchase of office sites for the three Departments named. These columns have argued the case of those buildings more than once. Every consideration of national pride and self-respect should move Congress to make the allowances inserted in the bill by the Senate.

But if national pride and self-respect will not reach the Speaker as forces helpful to his organization, let him consider national economy. It applies to this project as effectively as to any other similar one which could be cited. The Government pays now as rental for departmental quarters, not the interest on $3,000,000 or $6,000,000, but the interest on $18,000,000, and that sum takes no account of the loss through inefficient and inconvenient service due to the present accommodations. Calculating those items also, the annual outlay on bad departmental accommodations is the interest on $34,000,000, in which the three Departments indicated have more than their share.

The Speaker is above all a business man. Let him consider these public building items in the light of good business administration.

I say again, Mr. President, it was with great reluctance that we allowed this amendment that the Senate committee and the Senate had put into the bill to go out in conference.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator from West Virginia will, as he has indicated, see that the clerks push forward the matter of the report, because that is all that is keeping the Senate here, as the Senator understands.

Mr. SCOTT. They are writing it up. It will be ready in about twenty minutes, I understand.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to add a word to what my colleague on the committee has said about public buildings in the District of Columbia. He has spoken of the good business policy of buying the property before it is higher, and it seems to me that the best business policy would require us to construct every building that is required for the use of the Government in Washington, where the Government has to pay but 2 per cent for money if it borrows, and at present—and the future promises the same—we shall not have to borrow. We should build, instead of paying, as we do now, from 7 to 15 per cent rent on the cost of buildings. As a matter of business, we ought to proceed generously and rapidly with public buildings in the District of Columbia.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. President, I intended when the general deficiency bill was pending in the Senate to submit a few remarks as to the legislation which was enacted a year ago on the general deficiency appropriation bill. I ask the Secretary to read the statute which was then enacted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested by the Senator from Indiana.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 3. Section 3679 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3679. No Department of the Government shall expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year or involve the Government in any contract or obligation for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations unless such contract or obligation is authorized by law; nor shall any Department or officer of the Government accept voluntary service for the Government or employ personal service in excess of that authorized by law except in cases of sudden emergency involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property. All appropriations made for contingent expenses or other general purposes, except appropriations made for the fulfillment of contract obligations expressly authorized by law or for objects required or authorized by law without reference to the amounts annually appropriated therefor, shall, on or before the begining of each fiscal year, be so apportioned by monthly or other allotments as to prevent undue expenditures in one portion of the year that may require deficiency or additional appropriations to complete the service of the fiscal year, and all such apportionments shall be adhered to except when waived or modified in specific cases by the written order of the head of the Executive Department or other Government establishment having control of the expenditure, and all such waivers or modifications, together with the reasons therefor, shall be communicated to Congress in connection with estimates for any additional appropriations required on account thereof.

"Any person violating any provision of this section shall be summarily removed from office and may also be punished by a fine of not less than $100 or by imprisonment for not less than one month."

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. President, I drafted that provision of law a year ago and submitted it to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and it met with his hearty approval. There was great objection to it by the different Departments of the Government.

Now, after the law has been in operation for a year, I think it is due to the Senator from Maine as well as to myself to say something about its effect.

The general deficiency bill a year ago carried appropriations amounting to $31,000,000 of deficiencies. It is fair to say that of the $31,000,000 about $10,000,000 covered judgments and audited claims, as only about $20,000,000 in that bill carried real deficiencies.

The bill that passed the Senate last night, in charge of the Senator from Maine, carried only $10,000,000 of deficiencies and of the $10,000,000, $7,000,000 was in payment of judgments and audited claims. So the result of that statute for one year, I could safely say, has resulted in the saving of over $10,000,000 to the Government, if not the full difference of $20,000,000,

The Departments of the Government have grown into the habit of ignoring the acts of Congress. The Appropriations Committees would sit for weeks and work out what they believed the different Departments ought to expend along various lines, and the Departments would pay no attention to the acts of Congress, but simply use any sum of money they saw fit to use, and come back to Congress in the way of deficiencies and say, "Why, here, the money is expended. What can we do?" And as a rule Congress would appropriate and make good the deficiency, the tendency being simply to ignore the Congress of the United States and turn this Government over to the different Departments to run at their own good will.

I am glad to state, Mr. President, that the present chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, Mr. TAWNEY, consulting with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], has amended this section at this session, and we hope, with the section of the statute as now amended, to absolutely prevent the Departments of the Government from ignoring the Congress of the United States and spending more money than we authorize them to spend.

A year ago Congress reduced the estimates of the different Departments over $42,000,000. When this Congress adjourns, with the appropriations made for this year, there will have been a very great reduction, and I think it is time that Congress should look to it that the Departments of the Government shall not control matters of appropriation, but that Congress shall control them.

There has been a growing tendency to build up in the great Departments of the Government newspaper bureaus to hammer Congress into doing their sweet will. Now, with ten years' experience on appropriations, I can say that, when that time comes, there will be deficiencies every year, because if you were to follow all the recommendations that they make for the expenditure of money, they would bankrupt the Government in just a little while.

Mr. President, I think it due to myself and due to the Senator from Maine, in view of the criticisms during last summer, when this provision went into effect, to state to Congress and to the country the result of this provision of law.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the country, and the Treasury, representing the Departments through which the expenditures finally come, owe a great debt to the Senator from Indiana for originating and carrying through this practical reform. My part in it was very slight, and any credit that is due to me is very small compared to what is due to the Senator from Indiana. I was very glad in every way to conform to his idea of meeting a great abuse that had grown up in almost all the Departments of every year seeking to avoid the limitations on appropriation made by Congress and running into extravagant deficiencies.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. To what extent has the present law been violated since it was enacted?

Mr. HALE. I think all the Departments have been careful with regard to countervailing the law. Of course, it takes time, in a great government expending the amount of money that we do, to get used to new conditions, and there have been some cases—emergency cases—which are provided for in the law, where there have been deficiencies, and there always will be some real deficiencies.

The law has been strengthened. It is provided in one of the appropriation acts this year that, in the first place, the Departments shall send in their estimates, as far as practicable, all at once. They had a fashion of sending in what was at hand and then to keep sending in and claiming that they must have new appropriations because they had new estimates. We are providing for all that.

I hope in time the Departments will take notice that it is Congress which provides the money; that it is the discretion of Congress that settles the amount of money, and that no Secretary and no understrapper in a Department has any business to beset Congress and importune for more appropriations than Congress has given. If the head of the Department believes that under the statute there are real deficiencies and emergency deficiencies, he should estimate them, and Congress should settle it, but for one I am tired of being importuned by the minor officers or understrappers of the different Departments, the Assistant Secretaries and heads of bureaus, to make more and more appropriations. I hope that pactice will cease.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to draw the attention of the Senator from Maine to one item. What he is talking about is of great interest, and I think the Senate should be attracted by it. I think the Senator from Maine and others are getting along faster in the real reduction of deficiencies than appears from the deficiency bills themselves, for the reason that after the estimates are made by the Departments there is liable to be at the other end of the Capitol appropriations something less than these estimates by the Departments called for. They come here; sometimes they are raised; but when we go into conference I notice the first items liable to go out in dispute are those where the law provides for certain annual appropriations, as, for instance, for subsistence and salaries of the Army and Navy. I notice that in the Army appropriation bill the sum is apt to be reduced in the conference below what the estimates are and below what the law provides for, and therefore there occurs a seeming deficiency which is really not a deficiency. I do not know whether we can protect ourselves against that or not.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, having had charge of the bill providing for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government I have noticed in handling the bill this year that there has been apparently a greater effort or desire expressed on the part of the Cabinet officers and their subordinates to keep themselves within the limits of the appropriations, and I suppose that in part it is the result of the law that has just been read, which was drafted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY].

There is another thing that I want to say. The provision that we put in that bill providing that the Cabinet officers shall make full estimates for all that they desire in the bill, and it shall be sent in the regular estimates, so as to avoid the constant writing of letters to Congress for a little more money or for something that they had forgotten, I think will work great advantage to the Government. It has grown up as a practice, probably not any more in this Administration than any other, to put in the estimates what they think of at the time as convenient and easily gathered together, and leaving out hundreds of items they write letters about. They do not seem to realize what annoyance that sort of proceeding is. The result of it has been that we put a provision in that bill requiring that full estimates shall be made of all the expenditures necessary for the Government. I am inclined to think that we shall get the mode of doing business in better shape, and that we shall save money by the course which has recently been pursued.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 72) fixing the date upon which the act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, approved June —, 1896, shall go into effect; which was to amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution fixing the date upon which the act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, approved June 29, 1906, shall go into effect."

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF RIVER AND HARBOR EXAMINATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 183) providing for the printing of reports ordered by the river and harbor act of March 3, 1905; which was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That at any time prior to the assembling of Congress in December, 1906, all reports of preliminary examinations and surveys ordered in the river and harbor act of March 3, 1905, that may be ready for printing shall, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be printed by the Public Printer as documents of the Fifty-ninth Congress.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator withhold the motion until I can make a request?

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask to be excused from further service on the Committee on Manufactures and also on the Committee to Investigate the Condition of the Potomac River Front at Washington.

I desire to say that I have remained on the Committee on Manufactures during the last two or three years only for the purpose of securing the enactment of what is known as the "pure-food bill." That bill having become a law at this session, I desire to be relieved from further service on that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota that he be excused from further service on the committees named by him? The Chair hears none, and the request is granted.

INVESTIGATION OF AFFAIRS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, a few moments ago I resisted the resolution proposed by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] to appoint a committee to visit the Indian Territory and investigate certain matters relating to that country. Since then I have conferred with the Senator from Wyoming, and he informs me that the purpose of the resolution is to enable that committee to obtain some personal knowledge concerning conditions existing in that country.

The Senator from Wyoming further explained to me that the purpose of the committee is to send a subcommittee there, so that they may report as to personal knowledge concerning the condition of that country with particular reference to the disposition of the coal and other mineral lands and as to the removal of the restrictions upon the alienation of Indian allotments. If the committee will visit that country and see the great progress it has made and the splendid white population which now inhabits it, I feel confident that it will take my view that the only wise legislation now is with reference to the progress of the white man rather than to the preservation of the Indian. I believe that that investigation will be conducted thoroughly and that there will be no attempt made to undo what has already been done with reference to the settlement of the vexed Indian problems.

I not only believe, Mr. President, that the committee will find that it is sensible and just to remove the restrictions on alienation in that country, but I believe that when they investigate the subject and find the great value and possibilities of those mineral lands, they will dedicate them to a school fund for the education of the children of that country. Hoping that such will be the result of their visit and investigation, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was defeated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas, to reconsider the vote by which the resolution reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] was disagreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I desire to inquire what appropriation, if any, the pending resolution carries?

Mr. KEAN. The resolution provides that the expenses shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The language of the resolution is: "The necessary expenses of said committee shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate."

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the chairman of that committee what the probable expenses have been estimated by the committee to be?

Mr. KEAN. The committee has made no estimate.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. There are two questions involved in that Territory; one the question of alienation, and the other the disposition of the coal lands. Personally I am not opposed to this resolution, nor am I in favor of it. I do not believe that it is possible to determine the value of coal lands in the Indian Territory or in any other section, except as those lands are developed. I have no doubt much of the land now segregated will prove to have no coal, while there will be vast deposits found outside of the land now segregated.

In regard to the question of alienation, I do not believe that much can be learned by studying the situation down there. It is a broad question; it is a question we have got to ultimately settle from our general knowledge and on our best judgment of what the outcome will be.

I share in the sentiments of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]; but I want to say that this investigation is not designed so much for the information of Senators of the committee who are to visit the Indian Territory as it is for the members of the Senate outside of the committee. The committee, with one or two exceptions, is pretty thoroughly impressed with the importance of as rapidly as possible removing the restrictions against alienation and opening that country to settlement.

As to the amount proposed to be expended, there has been no estimate made, so far as I know.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the inquiry I made with reference to the probable cost of this committee leads me to call attention to the expenses of the Government for the past four years.

On the 14th of September, I believe it was, 1901, by the death of President McKinley, Vice-President Roosevelt became the acting President of the United States, upon whom, to use the language of the Constitution, the powers and duties of the office of President devolved. It was not, however, until 1903 that the full effect of the Administration of President, or acting President, Roosevelt—whichever it may be—upon expenditures was developed; and I desire to call attention to the total revenues and expenditures of the Government for the years 1903, 1904, 1905, and 1906, as stated in the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Total revenues and expenditures for the years named, as shown by the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Revenues	$694,621,117.64
Expenditures	640,323,450.28
Surplus	54,297,667.36

1904.

Revenues	684,214,373.74
Expenditures	725,984,945.65
Deficit	41,770,571.91

The sum of $50,164,500 was paid this year on the Panama Canal matter. Aside from this amount expenditures increased that year more than $35,000,000 over the previous year.

1905.

Revenues	$697,101,269.95
Expenditures	720,105,498.55
Deficit	23,004,228.60

The sum of $3,918,819.83 was paid this year on the Panama Canal matter. It will be observed, however, that omitting this and although expenditures for 1904 were augmented by the abnormal Panama appropriation, exceeding $50,000,000, the expenditures for this year (1905) were almost equal to those of 1904, and exceeded those of 1903 by $75,863,228.44.

1906 (ESTIMATED).

Revenues	$738,590,515.00
Expenditures	746,590,515.00
Deficit	8,000,000.00

The sum of $12,500,000 for the Panama Canal is included in this estimate of expenditures. Deducting this amount, the expenditures for 1906 were $13,985,016.45 greater than 1905 and $93,767,064.72 greater than 1903, after which Panama expenditures began.

Exclusive of the Panama appropriation, the increase of expenditures in 1904 over 1903 was $35,496,995.37; the increase in 1905 over 1904 was $40,366,233.07, excluding Panama each year; and the increase in 1906 over 1905, exclusive of Panama each year, was $17,903,836.28. This shows an aggregate increase of expenditures, excluding all expenses in Panama, of $93,767,064.72 in three years. As usual with this Administration, expenditures for the military and naval establishments increased for this period, and of the preceding amount the increase for the naval establishment alone exceeded $34,000,000 for the three years. The total expenditures for the years 1903, 1904, 1905, and 1906 was $2,933,004,409.48, and deducting Panama expenses it was $2,866,421,089.65. The total expenditures of the years 1898, 1899, 1900, and 1901, the four full years of McKinley, was $2,430,316,390.29. It thus appears that, exclusive of all expenses in Panama, the expenditures for the four years of Roosevelt exceeded those of the four years of McKinley, although he conducted the Spanish war, by the extraordinary sum of $436,104,699.36.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT subsequently appointed as the members of the committee authorized by the resolution of Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, Mr. LONG, Mr. BRANDEGEE, Mr. TELLER, and Mr. CLARK of Montana.

HOURS OF LABOR OF RAILROAD EMPLOYEES.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin if his proposition is not going to lead to any extended debate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not think it will lead to any debate,

I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin submits a request for unanimous consent, which will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

I ask unanimous consent that the pending bill for the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads may come up for consideration as the unfinished business on the second Monday of December, at 2 o'clock p. m.; that the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] to recommit the bill, together with my motion to lay on the table, be withdrawn, and that a vote be had on all pending amendments and the bill at 3 o'clock on Wednesday, December 12, 1906, without further debate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Wisconsin if, in his judgment, the request, if agreed to, would commit the Senate against the making of a motion to recommit when the matter comes before the Senate during the next session?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If it does not, I will modify the request so that that shall be——

Mr. GALLINGER. But I would object to that. I think that is a parliamentary privilege that ought to be left open. It always is left open.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am submitting the request for unanimous consent——

Mr. GALLINGER. I am satisfied that it would be open anyway. Now, Mr. President, I shall not object, although I think it is bad procedure to mortgage any time in the short session for any special bill; but this matter has been discussed, and I think it very probable that it will not take very much time at the next session. I want, however, before giving my consent, to say a word or two.

I regret that last evening the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] felt it his duty to make some rather severe animadversions upon me, indicating that I was opposed to legislation in the interest of the laboring people of the country. In a very humble and quiet way I have done my part toward securing legislation in my own State and in Congress along what I thought very safe and sane lines, and I have never put myself in opposition to the interests of laboring men, as I understood them. I repeat that I regret that the Senator felt called upon to make remarks that will go out to the country indicating that I am not the friend, but the enemy, of the laboring classes, because that is not the fact.

I know the great interest the Senator from Wisconsin feels in this legislation. I know that he has devoted a good deal of his time during the past ten years or more to considering these questions; but the Senator from Wisconsin, wrapped up, as he is, in these matters, must not judge harshly those of us who take a more conservative and, possibly, a safer view of the questions than he does himself. That is all I care to say; and I do not object to the Senator's request.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I only wish to trench on the time and the courtesy of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to say that I made no observation in the discussion last evening as to the opposition of the Senator from New Hampshire toward laboring men as a class. Whatever I said had reference and application to railway employees and their interests as opposed to the interests of the railroad companies.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just a word, Mr. President. I need not argue with the Senator from Wisconsin, or with any other Senator, that, if my attitude toward railway employees is one of illiberality and injustice, my attitude necessarily toward other classes of laboring men would be the same; and I want to repudiate any intimation that I have ever taken that position in matters of legislation.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I do not feel disposed to agree that the motion to recommit shall be withdrawn, as the Senator requires by the proposed unanimous-consent agreement which he has had read at the Secretary's desk. I think this bill should be recommitted, though I am not disposed to higgle about that or to be unreasonable about it. But if it is not to be recommitted and is to be brought back here, with these twenty-five amendments pending—we were told last evening that that many have been proposed—and put into some proper shape, it will be necessary to have a good deal of discussion here in the open Senate that might very well be dispensed with.

I think the Senator is apprehensive that there will be an effort to prevent his getting a vote on this bill. I have not any idea that that can be done. I think it was quite natural that last evening there should be a disposition to prevent a vote. I did not want to vote myself, although I am friendly to this bill. There were so many amendments, and we have been having so many other things to think about that we were not in a position to put it in the best shape in which it could be put.

I think if the Senator would simply ask that the bill be taken up at the date named and then be proceeded with as the unfinished business until it is disposed of that would answer every purpose. I am sure that everybody here would recognize the Senator's right to have a vote on the bill and on every amendment, and it would not look as though there was any attempt to drive men to take a vote on the measure before they are ready to vote on it.

So far as being the representative of the laboring man is concerned, I do not think anybody in this body or in the public service anywhere would admit that he is not friendly to the laboring man. I have always tried to do whatever I could in his behalf. I am not always able to agree with everything that he wants; but I have never found the representatives of labor to be unreasonable, and, after discussion, we have always been able to come to an understanding, and I think we could again.

I do not think the manifestation of opposition to the bill last evening indicates that there would be any opposition of the character the Senator evidently apprehends there would be if this bill should go over without a day fixed on which to vote.

Then, I want to suggest that we have already fixed another matter for the 12th of December next. I do not know what date the Senator's request names as the date when a vote shall be taken; but we have fixed the 12th of December to vote in executive session on a treaty——

Mr. GALLINGER. That is so.

Mr. FORAKER. And I understood the Senator from Wisconsin to ask to have the vote on his bill taken on the same day.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. FORAKER. Let the agreement be again read.

The Secretary again read the request submitted by Mr. LA FOLLETTE, as follows:

I ask unanimous consent that the pending bill for the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads may come up for consideration as the unfinished business on the second Monday of December at 2 o'clock p. m.; that the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] to recommit the bill, together with my motion to lay on the table, be withdrawn, and that a vote be had on all pending amendments and the bill at 3 o'clock on Wednesday, December 12, 1906, without further debate.

Mr. KEAN. That would interfere with another unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish merely to say that I hope the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] will accept the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] for two reasons. First, it is clear that a request for unanimous consent such as the Senator submits, fixing a definite day for a vote, will not be given; and, second, the proposition of the Senator from Ohio is reasonable, and assures to an absolute certainty a vote upon the bill at an early day next session. If we agree now by unanimous consent to take the bill up and have it made the unfinished business by unanimous consent, then it must stay before the Senate, and can not even be displaced by a motion until a vote is had. If it is made the unfinished business by unanimous consent, nothing but unanimous consent can displace it. The manager of the bill then becomes master of the floor until his bill is disposed of. I think the Senator from Wisconsin has here an opportunity to get his bill certainly disposed of very early next session, and that is the reason I make the suggestion.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. May I interrupt the Senator for one moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply want to suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that, while I am friendly to the measure, I do not desire that the 12th of December should be fixed as the date upon which to vote, because that day is already set aside by unanimous consent for the action of the Senate on another matter.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Just a word, Mr. President. I desire to say that I think the Senate is somewhat confused as to the situation. By referring to the Calendar it will be found that the unfinished business is the bill to which the Senator has referred in his proposed order; and, of course, it will remain the unfinished business until the meeting of Congress in December.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will remain the unfinished business.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that is understood by everybody. I understood it when I framed the proposition for unanimous consent. I am willing that the first week of the session shall be given to other business, and I will modify my request for unanimous consent to the extent, and to the extent only, that another day than Wednesday, the 12th, be fixed for a date upon which the vote shall be taken. I do not care, I will say to the Senators, how long it be deferred. It may be a week later; but I do want to see some definite time fixed for a vote.

Not only was a vote on this bill prevented by filibustering yesterday, but that has been done from the time it was first made the unfinished business of the Senate. If it could be disposed of in that way for weeks at this session, with the determined effort of Senators who are opposed to the bill, it can be disposed of for the entire short session, because many things will be pressing then upon every hand.

I will say, Mr. President—and I feel that I am trespassing too long upon the kindness and the courtesy of the Senator from Pennsylvania, who gave way to let me make this request for unanimous consent—that I wish to modify the request in this respect, that instead of naming Wednesday, the 12th, Friday or the Monday following be named.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be the Tuesday following, I will say to the Senator—Tuesday, the 18th.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, on Tuesday, the 18th, at the hour named, that the vote shall be taken. I wish to substitute for the word "my," before "motion," the words "Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S," as it appears in the request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin modifies his request as stated.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin will readily appreciate that the Senate considers as he considers this a bill of very great importance. It has a definite and a good purpose. I do not think any Senator in the Chamber is opposed to the accomplishment of the result the bill contemplates. I stated to the Senator from Wisconsin when the bill became the unfinished business that it was my desire to consult with the railroad men operating trains in the State I have the honor to represent in part in this Chamber before being called upon to vote on the measure. I think it important that those operating trains in the intermountain country, presenting conditions in railway work that are sui generis, should be consulted personally before any act is passed materially affecting their domestic and general affairs.

The bill was the unfinished business. As candidly stated by the Senator from Wisconsin, I was not prepared to vote for the bill. The bill was not reported in this Chamber until the 9th day of this month. In the time that has intervened since then Senators have been constantly engaged in committee and conference work incident to the closing of a session of Congress. I do not think the Senator selects words wisely when denominating an honest desire to get information as partaking of a filibuster. There has been no needless opposition to this measure.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CARTER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. This bill was made the unfinished business—I do not know the date, but it was reported on the 9th of June, I understand.

Mr. CARTER. It has been made the unfinished business within a week.

Mr. GALLINGER. Within a week?

Mr. CARTER. Within a week.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had charge of a bill, during the present session, which, I think, was the unfinished business for almost three months, and I did not complain that there was any filibuster or needless delay because the bill was discussed that length of time. I do think it is not a just criticism that a bill, which has been the unfinished business but a week or ten days——

Mr. CARTER. Only since the 26th of this month has it been the unfinished business.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was quite surprised, and did not dare state it, but I thought it was the 26th of June. It has been the unfinished business only four days. It is not unusual for bills to remain on the Calendar three or four months as the unfinished business, and those of us who have been here longer than the Senator from Wisconsin have not been in the habit of charging Senators with filibustering if they wanted to discuss a bill within that length of time.

Mr. CARTER. In my experience here, when any Senator has expressed a desire to investigate a subject for the purposes of submitting observations upon it, that privilege is granted as a matter of course. I know of five Senators in the body who desire to be heard upon this bill who were engaged upon conference committees and could not be in the Chamber at the various times when it was taken up for consideration.

This bill will pass—carefully, judiciously prepared. There will be no filibuster and no more time taken in its consideration than the grave importance of the subject requires.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Wisconsin, on reflection, will not feel that he has been hardly used by the Senate on this very important bill. But I fancy the Senator does not care so much what has been done or what has taken place as he does about getting the bill disposed of at the next session. It seems to me he is all right in asking that a day be set to take up the bill, and I should hope that the Senate would agree to some such proposition as he has made, that a final vote shall be taken on a certain day. It is not very essential what that day is. I would want it understood, and I suppose every other Senator would, that in the meantime it is subject to whatever other business may come up, when this bill does not occupy the time. If the Senator gets a day fixed for its being taken up as the unfinished business, practically he has the matter settled. It will be in the way of everything else, and he will get a vote anyway. I do not see any objection to agreeing upon a day when the final vote shall be taken.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, this bill is now the unfinished business; and if it is the unfinished business now, will it not remain the unfinished business until it is disposed of in some way?

Mr. HALE. I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to say that he does not desire that the bill shall be brought before the Senate during the first week of the next session. There will be other things then, and it is a concession on his part when he fixes a later day, because undoubtedly it would be right in the way of everything the moment Congress assembled. I think the Senator is reasonable in fixing a time six or eight days after Congress has assembled, so that the bill will not interfere during that time with other business.

Mr. McCUMBER. There are interests in my State, and, I think, on both sides of this question, which desire a hearing before the committee. I do not know any other way to secure the proper hearing and to secure the proper data upon which Congress can act.

Mr. HALE. Let me say to the Senator right here, if a day is fixed, as the Senator from Wisconsin proposes, not at the beginning of the session, but a later day, it will give just the opportunity the Senator wants for hearings by the committee before the day comes when the Senator from Wisconsin wants to have the bill taken up.

Mr. McCUMBER. It may and it may not. The Senator knows as well as I do how difficult it is, even before the holiday recess, to get a quorum and to get the committee at work. The Senator understands as well as I do that there is always danger that you may not close a hearing within a certain time. You may commence your hearing at the very beginning of the session, but one matter brings out another, and you are compelled to send for other testimony and other witnesses. One proposition will invite attention to another proposition, and finally the day arrives when we are compelled to vote, and the committee has not accomplished its work and has not been able to make a report. What I want is a hearing—a fair, just, full, comprehensive hearing—so that all persons who want to be heard may be heard, and then as soon as the committee can make its report, if it is in two days or within a week or within two weeks, I shall be ready to vote on the question.

Mr. HALE. What the Senator says about the difficulty of getting a quorum together does not apply to the short session. In the long session it is difficult; the committees are not then constituted; but there is no reason why, when the short session assembles in December, the committee having this matter in charge should not take it up and have all the hearings that may be necessary and do it before the day comes when the Senator from Wisconsin will ask that the bill be taken up.

Mr. McCUMBER. Senators do not get here until about the 7th. We can not have any hearings before that time. And certainly after the bill is in the Senate I can not understand how the committee can go on and investigate. The moment it is made the unfinished business, whether it is the 6th or the 12th or any other day, that moment the committee loses jurisdiction of the subject-matter. For that reason I simply desire to say that I shall object to fixing a day for voting, and shall object to an early date being fixed when it shall be made the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is interposed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the house had passed the bill (S. 4169) to authorize the sale of certain real estate in the District of Columbia belonging to the United States.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 187) authorizing the purchase of the manuscript of a digest of the United States laws and decisions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

H. R. 12080. An act granting to the Siletz Power and Manufacturing Company a right of way for a water ditch or canal through the Siletz Indian Reservation, in Oregon;

H. R. 15673. An act for the relief of Harry A. Young;

H. R. 17842. An act granting a pension to Josephine V. Sparks;

H. R. 19844. An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes;

H. R. 20403. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 186. Joint resolution relative to the printing of 12,000 copies of the Report on the Progress of the Beet-Sugar Industry.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. PENROSE. I renew the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

HOURS OF LABOR OF RAILROAD EMPLOYEES.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday, the 10th day of January, 1907, the bill (S. 5133) to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by limiting the hours of service of employees thereon shall, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, be voted upon.

Mr. KEAN. If not sooner disposed of.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Why, of course, if not sooner disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that on Thursday——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The 10th day of January.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The 10th day of January——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Nineteen hundred and seven, the bill (S. 5133) to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by limiting the hours of service of employees thereon shall, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, be finally voted upon, unless earlier disposed of.

Mr. McCUMBER. At what time, then, will it be made the unfinished busness?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is now the unfinished business, and will so remain.

Mr. McCUMBER. That will give no opportunity whatever for the committee to examine the matter and grant any hearings to anyone. I do not know how the committee can have a hearing when the bill will be in the Senate and out of the hands of the committee.

Mr. HALE. That is done every day by committees while the subject is being considered here. The Senator is given a full month by this arrangement, in which the committee can meet and consider what amendments and whatever else may be necessary.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the committee can have a hearing on it at any time, I do not care whether it is two days or three days before the vote shall be taken, so that either side can be heard. The time for voting is reasonable, and I shall not object.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I should say that will be done as a matter of course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Senators must address the Chair.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will not be as earnest as he commonly is if he does not during the whole month given by this proposition have the committee hear anything that he wishes to submit. There is no trouble about that. There is a full month for the committee to meet and to give any hearings and to prepare any amendments. The committee can meet any time. The objection which the Senator from North Dakota raises is not a real objection.

Mr. FORAKER. The agreement which the Senator from Indiana asks for should apply to voting on all amendments that are now pending or may be offered.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I intended to make that modification.

Mr. FORAKER. That should be in the agreement the Senator has asked for, if it be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana requests unanimous consent that on Thursday, January 10, next——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. At 3 o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At 3 o'clock p. m. Senate bill 5133 be voted upon, and all amendments then pending or which may be offered, unless sooner disposed of.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is right.

Mr. FORAKER. Without further debate after 3 o'clock on that day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 6283) granting an increase of pension to Clara A. R. Devereux.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 188) making additional appropriation for expenses under the Interstate Commerce Commission; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and then were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

S. 88. An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for other purposes;

S. 1812. An act for the relief of Lieut. James M. Pickerell, United States Navy;

S. 2188. An act granting to the city of Durango, in the State of Colorado, certain lands therein described for water reservoirs;

S. 4774. An act relating to the movements and anchorage of vessels in Hampton Roads, the harbors of Norfolk and Newport News, and adjacent waters, in the State of Virginia;

S. 5901. An act to extend the time for completion of the Alaska Central Railway, and for other purposes;

S. 6283. An act granting an increase of pension to Clara A. R. Devereux; and

H. J. Res. 187. Joint resolution authorizing the purchase of the manuscript of a Digest of the United States Laws and Decisions; and

H. J. Res. 188. Joint resolution making additional appropriation for expenses under the Interstate Commerce Commission.

APPROPRIATION FOR INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 188) making appropriation for expenses under the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $81,597.33 for additional expenses of the Interstate Commerce Commission during the fiscal year 1907, authorized under the act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the joint resolution may be considered.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS OF POSTMASTERS IN THE STATES AND TERRITORIES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the resolution submitted by Mr. DICK on the 29th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to have stated in the Sixth Auditor's office the salary accounts of former postmasters who served at post-offices in the various States and Territories of the United States in terms between July 1, 1864, and July 1, 1874, and who applied to the Postmaster-General, prior to January 1, 1887, for payment of increased salary under the act of March 3, 1883, such salary accounts to be stated upon the registered returns of each postmaster for each term of service specified, and by the method and rule laid down by the Postmaster-General for the statement and payment of salary accounts of former postmasters under the act of March 3, 1883, in his public order of February 16, 1884, directing payment of salaries by commissions and box rents, less the salaries paid at time of service; and to enable the Secretary of the Treasury the better to comply with this resolution the Postmaster-General is hereby directed to turn over to the Sixth Auditor all the data now in his hands pertaining to each and every such claim, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to report to the Senate such stated salary accounts of former postmasters as soon as they can be made ready, not later than the beginning of the second session of the Fifty-ninth Congress.

Mr. DICK. Because of the situation in reference to the public business, I will not now ask for action on the resolution, but give notice that I shall call it up on the first Wednesday in December.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it lie on the table, subject to call.

Mr. DICK. Yes; that is the course to be taken.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table, subject to the call of the Senator from Ohio.

MEAT INSPECTION.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask unanimous consent that that portion of the agricultural appropriation bill known as the "meat-inspection amendment" may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The amendment referred to is as follows:

That for the purpose of preventing the use in interstate or foreign commerce, as hereinafter provided, of meat and meat food products which are unsound, unhealthful, unwholesome, or otherwise unfit for human food, the Secretary of Agriculture, at his discretion, may cause to be made, by inspectors appointed for that purpose, an examination and inspection of all cattle, sheep, swine, and goats before they shall be allowed to enter into any slaughtering, packing, meat-canning, rendering, or similar establishment, in which they are to be slaughtered and the meat and meat food products thereof are to be used in interstate or foreign commerce; and all cattle, swine, sheep, and goats found on such inspection to show symptoms of disease shall be set apart and slaughtered separately from all other cattle, sheep, swine, or goats, and when so slaughtered the carcasses of said cattle, sheep, swine, or goats shall be subject to a careful examination and inspection, all as provided by the rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture as herein provided for.

That for the purposes hereinbefore set forth the Secretary of Agriculture shall cause to be made by inspectors appointed for that purpose, as hereinafter provided, a post-mortem examination and inspection of the carcasses and parts thereof of all cattle, sheep, swine, and goats to be prepared for human consumption at any slaughtering, meat-canning, salting, packing, rendering, or similar establishment in any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia for transportation or sale as articles of interstate or foreign commerce; and the carcasses and parts thereof of all such animals found to be sound, healthful, wholesome, and fit for human food shall be marked, stamped, tagged, or labeled as "Inspected and passed;" and said inspectors shall label, mark, stamp, or tag as "Inspected and condemned," all carcasses and parts thereof of animals found to be unsound, unhealthful, unwholesome, or otherwise unfit for human food; and all carcasses and parts thereof thus inspected and condemned shall be destroyed for food purposes by the said establishment in the presence of an inspector, and the Secretary of Agriculture may remove inspectors from any such establishment which fails to so destroy any such condemned carcass or part thereof, and said inspectors, after said first inspection shall, when they deem it necessary, reinspect said carcasses or parts thereof to determine whether since the first inspection the same have become unsound, unhealthful, unwholesome, or in any way unfit for human food, and if any carcass or any part thereof shall, upon examination and inspection subsequent to the first examination and inspection, be found to be unsound, unhealthful, unwholesome, or otherwise unfit for human food, it shall be destroyed for food purposes by the said establishment in the presence of an inspector, and the Secretary of Agriculture may remove inspectors from any establishment which fails to so destroy any such condemned carcass or part thereof.

The foregoing provisions shall apply to all carcasses or parts of carcasses of cattle, sheep, swine, and goats, or the meat or meat products thereof, which may be brought into any slaughtering, meat-canning, salting, packing, rendering, or similar establishment, and such examination and inspection shall be had before the said carcasses or parts thereof shall be allowed to enter into any department wherein the same are to be treated and prepared for meat food products; and the foregoing provisions shall also apply to all such products which, after having been issued from any slaughtering, meat-canning, salting, packing, rendering, or similar establishment, shall be returned to the same or to any similar establishment where such inspection is maintained.

That for the purposes hereinbefore set forth the Secretary of Agriculture shall cause to be made by inspectors appointed for that purpose an examination and inspection of all meat food products prepared for interstate or foreign commerce in any slaughtering, meat-canning, salting, packing, rendering, or similar establishments, and for the purposes of any examination and inspection said inspectors shall have access at all times, by day or night, whether the establishment be operated or not, to every part of said establishment; and said inspectors shall mark, stamp, tag, or label as "Inspected and passed" all such products found to be sound, healthful, and wholesome, and which contain no dyes, chemicals, preservatives, or ingredients which render such meat or meat food products unsound, unhealthful, unwholesome, or unfit for human food; and said inspectors shall label, mark, stamp, or tag as "Inspected and condemned" all such products found unsound, unhealthful, and unwholesome, or which contain dyes, chemicals, preservatives, or ingredients which render such meat or meat food products unsound, unhealthful, unwholesome, or unfit for human food; and all such condemned meat food products shall be destroyed for food purposes, as hereinbefore provided, and the Secretary of Agriculture may remove inspectors from any establishment which fails to so destroy such condemned meat food products: Provided, That, subject to the rules and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, the provisions hereof in regard to preservatives shall not apply to meat food products for export to any foreign country and which are prepared or packed according to the specifications or directions of the foreign purchaser, when no substance is used in the preparation or packing thereof in conflict with the laws of the foreign country to which said article is to be exported; but if said articles shall be in fact sold or offered for sale for domestic use or consumption then this proviso shall not exempt said article from the operation of all the other provisions of this act.

That when any meat or meat food product prepared for interstate or foreign commerce which has been inspected as hereinbefore provided and marked "Inspected and passed" shall be placed or packed in any can, pot, tin, canvas, or other receptacle or covering in any establishment where inspection under the provisions of this act is maintained, the person, firm, or corporation preparing said product shall cause a label to be attached to said can, pot, tin, canvas, or other receptacle or covering, under the supervision of an inspector, which label shall state that the contents thereof have been "inspected and passed" under the provisions of this act; and no inspection and examination of meat or meat food products deposited or inclosed in cans, tins, pots, canvas, or other receptacle or covering in any establishment where inspection under the provisions of this act is maintained shall be deemed to be complete until such meat or meat food products have been sealed or inclosed in said can, tin, pot, canvas, or other receptacle or covering under the supervision of an inspector, and no such meat or meat food products shall be sold or offered for sale by any person, firm, or corporation in interstate or foreign commerce under any false or deceptive name; but established trade name or names which are usual to such products and which are not false and deceptive and which shall be approved by the Secretary of Agriculture are permitted.

The Secretary of Agriculture shall cause to be made, by experts in sanitation or by other competent inspectors, such inspection of all slaughtering, meat-canning, salting, packing, rendering, or similar establishments in which cattle, sheep, swine, and goats are slaughtered and the meat and meat food products thereof are prepared for interstate or foreign commerce as may be necessary to inform himself concerning the sanitary conditions of the same, and to prescribe the rules and regulations of sanitation under which such establishments shall be maintained; and where the sanitary conditions of any such establishment are such that the meat or meat food products are rendered unclean, unsound, unhealthful, unwholesome, or otherwise unfit for human food, he shall refuse to allow said meat or meat food products to be labeled, marked, stamped, or tagged as "Inspected and passed."

That the Secretary of Agriculture shall cause an examination and inspection of all cattle, sheep, swine, and goats, and the food products thereof, slaughtered and prepared in the establishments hereinbefore described for the purposes of interstate or foreign commerce to be made during the nighttime as well as during the daytime when the slaughtering of said cattle, sheep, swine, and goats, or the preparation of said food products is conducted during the nighttime.

That on and after October 1, 1906, no person, firm, or corporation shall transport or offer for transportation, and no carrier of interstate or foreign commerce shall transport or receive for tansportation from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or to any place under the jurisdiction of the United States, or to any foreign country, any carcasses or parts thereof, meat, or meat food products thereof which have not been inspected, examined, and marked as "inspected and passed," in accordance with the terms of this act and with the rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture: Provided, That all meat and meat food products on hand on October 1, 1906, at establishments where inspection has not been maintained, or which have been inspected under existing law, shall be examined and labeled under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe, and then shall be allowed to be sold in intertsate or foreign commerce.

That no person, firm, or corporation, or officer, agent, or employee thereof, shall forge, counterfeit, simulate, or falsely represent, or shall without proper authority use, fail to use, or detach, or shall knowingly and wrongfully alter, deface, or destroy, or fail to deface or destroy, any of the marks, stamps, tags, labels, or other identification devices provided for in this act, or in and as directed by the rules and regulations prescribed hereunder by the Secretary of Agriculture, on any carcasses, parts of carcasses, or the food product, or containers thereof, subject to the provisions of this act, or any certificate in relation thereto, authorized or required by this act or by the said rules and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture.

That the Secretary of Agriculture shall cause to be made a careful inspection of all cattle, sheep, swine, and goats intended and offered for export to foreign countries at such times and places, and in such manner as he may deem proper, to ascertain whether such cattle, sheep, swine, and goats are free from disease.

And for this purpose he may appoint inspectors who shall be authorized to give an official certificate clearly stating the condition in which such cattle, sheep, swine, and goats are found.

And no clearance shall be given to any vessel having on board cattle, sheep, swine, or goats for export to a foreign country until the owner or shipper of such cattle, sheep, swine, or goats has a certificate from the inspector herein authorized to be appointed, stating that the said cattle, sheep, swine, or goats are sound and healthy, or unless the Secretary of Agriculture shall have waived the requirement of such certificate for export to the particular country to which such cattle, sheep, swine, or goats are to be exported.

That the Secretary of Agriculture shall also cause to be made a careful inspection of the carcasses and parts thereof of all cattle, sheep, swine, and goats, the meat of which, fresh, salted, canned, corned, packed, cured, or otherwise prepared, is intended and offered for export to any foreign country, at such times and places and in such manner as he may deem proper.

And for this purpose he may appoint inspectors who shall be authorized to give an official certificate stating the condition in which said cattle, sheep, swine, or goats, and the meat thereof, are found.

And no clearance shall be given to any vessel having on board any fresh, salted, canned, corned, or packed beef, mutton, pork, or goat meat, being the meat of animals killed after the passage of this act, or except as hereinbefore provided for export to and sale in a foreign country from any port in the United States, until the owner or shipper thereof shall obtain from an inspector appointed under the provisions of this act a certificate that the said cattle, sheep, swine, and goats were sound and healthy at the time of inspection, and that their meat is sound and wholesome, unless the Secretary of Agriculture shall have waived the requirements of such certificate for the country to which said cattle, sheep, swine, and goats or meats are to be exported.

That the inspectors provided for herein shall be authorized to give official certificates of the sound and wholesome condition of the cattle, sheep, swine, and goats, their carcasses and products as herein described, and one copy of every certificate granted under the provisions of this act shall be filed in the Department of Agriculture, another copy shall be delivered to the owner or shipper, and when the cattle, sheep, swine, and goats or their carcasses and products are sent abroad, a third copy shall be delivered to the chief officer of the vessel on which the shipment shall be made.

That no person, firm, or corporation engaged in the interstate commerce of meat or meat food products shall transport or offer for transportation, sell or offer to sell any such meat or meat food products in any State or Territory or in the District of Columbia or any place under the jurisdiction of the United States, other than in the State or Territory or in the District of Columbia or any place under the jurisdiction of the United States in which the slaughtering, packing, canning, rendering, or other similar establishment owned, leased, operated by said firm, person, or corporation is located unless and until said person, firm, or corporation shall have complied with all of the provisions of this act.

That any person, firm or corporation, or any officer or agent of any such person, firm, or corporation, who shall violate any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished on conviction thereof by a fine of not exceeding $10,000 or imprisonment for a period not more than two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

That the Secretary of Agriculture shall appoint from time to time inspectors to make examination and inspection of all cattle, sheep, swine, and goats, the inspection of which is hereby provided for, and of all carcasses and parts thereof, and of all meats and meat food products thereof, and of the sanitary conditions of all establishments in which such meat and meat food products hereinbefore described are prepared; and said inspectors shall refuse to stamp, mark, tag, or label any carcass or any part thereof, or meat food product therefrom, prepared in any establishment hereinbefore mentioned, until the same shall have actually been inspected and found to be sound, healthful, wholesome, and fit for human food, and to contain no dyes, chemicals, preservatives, or ingredients which render such meat food product unsound, unhealthful, unwholesome, or unfit for human food; and to have been prepared under proper sanitary conditions, hereinbefore provided for; and shall perform such other duties as are provided by this act and by the rules and regulations to be prescribed by said Secretary of Agriculture; and said Secretary of Agriculture shall, from time to time, make such rules and regulations as are necessary for the efficient execution of the provisions of this act, and all inspections and examinations made under this act shall be such and made in such manner as described in the rules and regulations prescribed by said Secretary of Agriculture not inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

That any person, firm, or corporation, or any agent or employee of any person, firm, or corporation who shall give, pay, or offer, directly or indirectly, to any inspector, deputy inspector, chief inspector, or any other officer or employee of the United States authorized to perform any of the duties prescribed by this act or by the rules and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture any money or other thing of value, with intent to influence said inspector, deputy inspector, chief inspector, or other officer or employee of the United States in the discharge of any duty herein provided for, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $5,000 not more than $10,000 and by imprisonment not less than one year nor more than three years; and any inspector, deputy inspector, chief inspector, or other officer or employee of the United States authorized to perform any of the duties prescribed by this act who shall accept any money, gift, or other thing of value from any person, firm, or corporation, or officers, agents, or employees thereof, given with intent to influence his official action, or who shall receive or accept from any person, firm, or corporation engaged in interstate or foreign commerce any gift, money, or other thing of value given with any purpose or intent whatsoever, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be summarily discharged from office, and shall be punished by a fine not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000 and by imprisonment not less than one year nor more than three years.

That the provisions of this act requiring inspection to be made by the Secretary of Agriculture shall not apply to animals slaughtered by any farmer on the farm and sold and transported as interstate or foreign commerce, nor to retail butchers and retail dealers in meat and meat food products, supplying their customers: Provided, That if any person shall sell or offer for sale or transportation for interstate or foreign commerce any meat or meat food products which are diseased, unsound, unhealthful, unwholesome, or otherwise unfit for human food, knowing that such meat food products are intended for human consumption, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment for a period of not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided also, That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to maintain the inspection in this act provided for at any slaughtering, meat canning, salting, packing, rendering, or similar establishment notwithstanding this exception, and that the persons operating the same may be retail butchers and retail dealers or farmers; and where the Secretary of Agriculture shall establish such inspection then the provisions of this act shall apply notwithstanding this exception.

That there is permanently appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000,000, for the expenses of the inspection of cattle, sheep, swine, and goats and the meat and meat food products thereof which enter into interstate or foreign commerce and for all expenses necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act relating to meat inspection, including rent and the employment of labor in Washington and elsewhere, for each year. And the Secretary of Agriculture shall, in his annual estimates made to Congress, submit a statement in detail, showing the number of persons employed in such inspections and the salary or per diem paid to each, together with the contingent expenses of such inspectors and where they have been and are employed.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE OF THE PEOPLE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, Senate Document No. 406, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, relating to the election of United States Senators by the direct vote of the people is being called for quite largely, and the edition is exhausted. I move that an additional print of 5,000 copies be made for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently said: A few moments ago I obtained consent for the reprinting of Senate Document 406. I meant to ask to have included in it a speech by the late Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, delivered in the Senate on Thursday and Friday, April 6 and 7, 1893. I ask to have that included.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands it is included in the original document; but if not, without objection, it is so ordered.

DIGEST OF UNITED STATES CUSTOMS LAWS AND DECISIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 187) authorizing the purchase of the manuscript of a digest of the United States Customs Laws and Decisions, which was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to purchase from the legal owners thereof, at a cost not to exceed $2,000, payable out of any funds not otherwise appropriated, the manuscript of a Digest of the United States Customs Laws and Decisions, compiled by Robert M. Cousar, deceased, and to have printed, with such revision as in his judgment may be necessary, not to exceed 1,000 copies, for the official use of the Treasury Department; and the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for said purpose. And the superintendent of documents is hereby authorized to reprint this document for sale at $2 per copy.

Mr. ELKINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. NELSON. I would inquire if anybody knows whether the manuscript has been examined, and whether it is a proper work. What Senator asked for the consideration of the joint resolution?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS].

Mr. ELKINS. I will state to the Senator for his information that this manuscript has been in the Treasury Department for four or five years. The House committee, where the joint resolution originated, have examined it carefully, and I am assured by the committee that it is all right. The Secretary of the Treasury urgently recommends it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the joint resolution be read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will again be read.

The Secretary again read the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. BERRY. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia if the person who prepared this digest was in the employment of the Government at the time it was done? There were a number of this kind of claims which the Committee on Appropriations refused to allow. I ask the Senator whether he was in the employ of the Treasury Department or any other Department of the Government, receiving compensation for such employment?

Mr. ELKINS. I can not answer that question, but I can state that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Board of Appraisers have urged the adoption of this measure. It is the only part of the laws of the United States on this subject which has not been reduced to the form of a digest. It is in use every day. The committee of the House reported the joint resolution favorably and recommended its passage.

Mr. BERRY. I understood from the Senator that it had been there for four or five years and used all the time.

Mr. ELKINS. They have been using it, but it has not been printed and it has not been paid for.

Mr. BERRY. It seems to me that we should make no difference between this and all other cases of the kind, but the Senator from Maine is more familiar with such matters than I am. He is the acting chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and if he thinks it is all right I shall not object.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPOONER. I read a letter this morning in the RECORD—I can not turn to it now—in which the Secretary of the Treasury said this was a good manuscript and they had used it for some years to advantage. He recommended, or thought it might be proper to pay, not exceeding $1,000 for it. It passed the House at $2,000.

Mr. ELKINS. At $2,000.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

S. W. LANGHORNE AND H. S. HOWELL.

Mr. HALE. I have just heard that the appropriations bill for public buildings will be here in about fifteen minutes, and I move that the Senate take a recess——

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator yield to me for one moment, to call up a short bill.

Mr. HALE. Very well; I withhold the motion.

Mr. CARTER. I ask for the consideration of the bill (S. 4421) for the relief of S. W. Langhorne and H. S. Howell.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to S. W. Langhorne and H. S. Howell, of Helena, Mont., $1,568, being the amount paid by them for rent of the building used by the United States for a land office at Helena, Mont., from November, 1885, up to and including June, 1900, a period of fifty-six months, at $14 per month, and the further sum of $280, being the amount paid by them for janitor service for the same period at $5 per month; in all, $1,848.

Mr. BERRY. The bill has been reported from the committee?

Mr. CARTER. It was reported unanimously from the Committee on Claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECESS.

Mr. HALE (at 11 o'clock and 50 minutes a. m.). I move that the Senate take a recess for fifteen minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at 12 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT HURON, S. DAK.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 318) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Huron, in the State of South Dakota.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 7, after the word "apparatus," to strike out "elevators;" in line 8, after the word "of," to strike out "the" and insert "a;" in the same line, after the words "United States," to strike out "courts;" in the same line, after the word "post-office," to insert "land office, United States Weather Bureau;" on page 2, line 1, after the word "apparatus," to strike out "elevators;" in line 2, after the word "hundred," to strike out "and seventy-five;" and in line 3, after the word "dollars," to strike out "which said sum of $175,000 is hereby appropriated for said purpose out of any moneys in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated;" so as to make the paragraph read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of a United States post-office, land office, United States weather bureau, and other Government offices, in the city of Huron and State of South Dakota, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, to strike out all from line 22 down to and including line 21 on page 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD H. OZMUN.

Mr. CLAPP. Is the Chair about to lay anything before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is nothing to be handed down at the moment.

Mr. CLAPP. In the meantime I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 744) for the relief of Edward H. Ozmun.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to Edward H. Ozmun the sum of $775.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWIN S. HALL.

Mr. CLAPP. If anyone else wants the floor, I do not desire, of course, to have bills called up to the exclusion of other Senators. If no one else wishes to call up anything, I will ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6166) for the relief of Edwin S. Hall.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to Edwin S. Hall, of Sauk Rapids, Benton County, Minn., $2,028.58.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota what were the services rendered?

Mr. CLAPP. Along in the sixteenth century the American people—however, I will not take time to rehearse the whole story, but will state that about two years ago some surveying was necessary in Minnesota, and the Secretary of the Treasury has no authority to pay for it without a direct appropriation by Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ETIENNE DE P. BUJAC.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4926) for the relief of Etienne De P. Bujac.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Etienne De P. Bujac, late second lieutenant, Thirty-third Infantry, United States Volunteers, $1,020, being money lost by him while in the military service of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECESS.

Mr. KEAN (at 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate take a recess for five minutes. There is no business before the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at 12 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I know that Senators are all anxious in regard to the public buildings bill, and I desire to say that we are waiting upon the other House. The delay is not the fault of the conferees. I have tried to ascertain the cause of the detention of the report in the other House, but I have been unable to do so. I am told over there every five minutes that the bill will be soon sent here.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

MR. WARREN (at 12 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.). Mr. President, on the other side the public buildings bill is yet under consideration, the conference report not having been made. The preparation of the bill to follow it providing the necessary appropriations is in the course of construction. Unless there is something here pressing, I move that the Senate take a recess until 1 o'clock.

Mr. KEAN. Say ten minutes.

Mr. SPOONER. Make it until ten minutes to 1 o'clock.

Mr. WARREN. It has been suggested to me to make it 12.50. I therefore move that the Senate take a recess until 12.50 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at 12 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

ISTHMIAN EXPOSITION AT TAMPA, FLA.

Mr. MALLORY. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to Senate concurrent resolution No. 28, requesting the President to issue his proclamation to the governors of the several States inviting them to participate in the Isthmian Exposition to be held at Tampa, Fla., commencing in January, 1908, etc. It is a Senate resolution similar to the one passed this morning, and I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. KEAN (at 1 o'clock p. m.). May I ask the Senator from West Virginia a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. KEAN. Would the Senator from West Virginia like us to take a recess for a short time?

Mr. SCOTT. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that I am expecting every minute the public buildings bill and the appropriation bill carrying the necessary appropriations to put it into effect. I believe that is what is delaying the House. I can not tell whether it will be five minutes or half an hour. I have been expecting it every minute for the last half hour.

Mr. KEAN (at 1 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate take a recess until half past 1 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at 1 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

"THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS."

Mr. HALE. I ask to have printed as a document a valuable article entitled "The President and Congress," by Senator BACON, in the Independent of March 8 last.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20410) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 189) to correct an error in the enrollment of, and repealing a certain provision in the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CORRECTION OF ERROR IN ENROLLMENT.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 189) to correct an error in the enrollment of, and repealing a certain provision in the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL.

Mr. SCOTT submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20410) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 5, 14, 17, 27, 30, 38, 40, 58, 66, 70, 92, and 159.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 72, 120, 146, 149, 150, 151, 152, 154, 161, 163, 164, and 165, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: On page 5, after line 8 of the bill, insert "United States post-office and court-house at Evanston, Wyo., $5,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

Transfer lines 1 and 2, page 12, of the bill, to page 6, after line 14, of the bill.

Also transfer lines 1, 2, and 3, page 14, of the bill, to page 7, after line 26 of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 54, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 11, after line 20 of the bill, insert the following: "United States post-office at Albuquerque, N. Mex., $100,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 84, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Transfer the matter inserted by amendment No. 88 to page 11, after line 22; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 108, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 5 of the bill, line 21, after the word "dollars," insert the following: "and for additional amount fifteen thousand dollars;" also, on page 17 of the bill, after line 18, insert the following: "United States post-office at New Ulm, Minn., $35,000;" also transfer the matter inserted by amendment No. 90 to page 11, after line 26; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 153, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 35 of the bill, after line 4, insert the following:

"SEC. 18. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a suitable site for the United States post-office and other governmental offices at Oklahoma City, Territory of Oklahoma: Provided, That $30,000 of the $50,000 heretofore appropriated for the acquisition of a suitable site and the erection and completion of a building thereon at said city shall be available for the acquisition by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise of a site only at Oklahoma City, Territory of Oklahoma."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 155, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 37 of the bill, line 14, after the word "condemnation," insert the words "or otherwise;" and the Senate agree to the same.

N. B. SCOTT,
F. E. WARREN,
C. A. CULBERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

RICHARD BARTHOLDT,
EDWIN C. BURLEIGH,
J. H. BANKHEAD,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. HALE (at 1 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.). Mr. President, information has come from the House of Representatives that the bills in the course of enrollment can not be completed before half past 5 or 6 o'clock. Therefore I move that the Senate take a recess until 5 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate took a recess until 5 o'clock p. m., at which hour it reassembled.

PRINTING OF IMMIGRATION BILL.

Mr. PENROSE. The immigration bill has passed finally both Houses and no copies of it have been printed for the use of the Senate. It is a very important measure, and there will be many demands during the summer for copies of the bill. I move that 5,000 copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator refer to the naturalization law or the immigration law?

Mr. PENROSE. I understand the bill is in conference and will not come up until next session.

Mr. CULLOM. To what bill does the Senator refer?

Mr. PENROSE. The immigration bill, now in conference.

Mr. CULLOM. That is what I wanted to find out.

Mr. PENROSE. I am referring to the immigration bill, for copies of which there will be a very great demand during the summer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that 5,000 copies of the immigration bill as it finally passed and is now in conference be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. I refer to the bill as it finally passed the House.

The motion was agreed to, and afterwards reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That S. 4403, an act to amend "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States," approved March 3, 1903, be printed as it passed the House and now in conference between the two Houses and that 5,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 189), to correct an error in enrollment of and repealing a certain provision in the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, approved June 30, 1906; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

JAMESTOWN EXPOSITION OF 1907.

Mr. DANIEL. Congress, Mr. President, has provided most generously for the celebration of the beginning of the American people at Jamestown, and I could not be content unless I expressed here the gratitude which I know that the people of Virginia feel to the Fifty-eighth Congress for their gracious, noble, and magnanimous action.

First of all do we owe it to the President of the United States, who all the time has favored the celebration of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of John Smith and his 105 adventurers at Jamestown in a manner becoming this great nation, and had it not been for his commanding influence, we know not that there would have been so agreeable a consummation of our wishes. Next to him, sir, do we owe this recognition to the gentlemen of the Republican party, who are in power in both Houses of Congress, and lastly to their Democratic associates.

To one and all I beg leave in this crude fashion to express the appreciation which I know is felt by every citizen of the old Commonwealth of Virginia, as well as by those who have the honor to represent her here and in the House of Representatives.

It was a saying of Thomas Jefferson that one warm thought is worth more than money. It is in the ideals that our people love and follow that we have a greater fortune than was ever piled up in treasury vaults or could ever be hoarded amongst the accumulations of men.

It was a great Virginian of the Revolutionary period who said in that crisis, "We are not Virginians, we are Americans."

As the Virginians were the first Americans of our race, so are they to-day Americans in every fiber of their being, and in every aspiration for the unity and the prosperity and happiness of our beloved country. And when the people of our sister States shall come to celebrate upon our soil the landing of those few Englishmen who planted there the beginning of the career of the American people, I know that in all the mighty throng there will be no thought but an American thought, and the nations of the earth may well exclaim "Behold how blessed it is for brethren to stand together in unity." On behalf of the people of Virginia and of their Representatives in Congress, I hereby thank my associates in this body for their magnanimous and generous action, which will long be appreciated and cherished.

RAILROAD IN ALASKA.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, in an account of the morning business of the Senate to-day I find the following item in an evening paper:

Mr. HANSBROUGH met defeat in an effort to get action on the bill authorizing the construction of a railroad and telegraph line in Alaska. He had the measure as it just passed the House laid before the Senate, but on motion of Mr. NELSON it was referred to the Committee on Territories, where it will sleep until next session.

I do not think the writer of that item intended any reflection upon me, but it is just such items as that which are the basis of numerous scandals against public men that happen very frequently, and too often follow them to the end of their lives.

I think the Chair and the Senate will bear me out when I say that what happened was this: The Chair in the regular course of business laid the bill before the Senate, and I asked that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, because it carried an appropriation of public lands, and therefore should have been sent to that committee. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who is a member of both the Committee on Public Lands and the Committee on Territories, asked that the bill go to the Committee on Territories, and after some debate it was so referred.

What makes the item more objectionable, Mr. President, is this: A similar bill has been pending in the Senate during the entire session, I believe. It came from the Committee on Territories. I have been opposed to that bill ever since it was introduced.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Just a moment. I have opposed it for the simple reason that the bill in question is a counterpart of the bill which came from the other House, and the Senate bill repeals an existing law with respect to the right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska. There is now a general law under which anybody can get a right of way in the district of Alaska for a railroad or a wagon road or a tramway, and there are several railroad companies organized under that law. But the bill in question is the one that came here from the House to-day. The one that has been pending in this body, coming from the Committee on Territories, provides for a special national charter for a railroad in the district of Alaska, and is therefore, in my judgment, an objectionable measure, especially on account of the facts I have given.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the bill to which the Senator from North Dakota refers is not similar to this bill at all. The original bill which was introduced and reported by the Committee is entirely different from this bill. A later bill was introduced and reported by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM] in the latter part of the session, akin to this bill; but that bill is entirely different from the House bill.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Minnesota——

Mr. NELSON. It grants no land, but it grants, instead, a right of way, and simply creates a corporation for the purpose of building a thoroughfare in Alaska from Prince William Sound up to Eagle, on the Yukon River. The parties who are opposed to that bill represent the White Pass people, an English syndicate, for the purpose of controlling the railway traffic passing out of the mouth of the Yukon River. The object of the bill is to create a company that would build a railroad through to take the Canadian freight.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do not know what the object of the bill is, Mr. President.

Mr. NELSON. The parties who are opposing the bill—parties outside here—represent the Canadian interests. The White Pass Railroad people are parties who are opposing this bill.

I will tell the Senator that when the proper time comes—and this is not the time to take the matter up. I will show him who are the parties who are opposing this measure.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I hope the Senator will do so.

Mr. NELSON. I will do so.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I simply want to say that the only interest I have in this whole transaction is to see that the bill goes to the proper committee. That is the first thing. The second thing is to have anyone who wants to build a railroad in Alaska proceed under the general law. That is the only point I make in regard to it. I do not know anybody connected with either one of these railroad companies.

I asked the gentleman who came to see me about it—a public official, by the way—why they had been pressing to get a special charter for this company, and he said it would make the bonds more salable. That is the only point that I have heard relative to the business end of this transaction.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I will give the Senator some information.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. NELSON. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before the Senator proceeds, if he will permit me, I wish to say that I have noticed the intense hostility displayed toward the bill that has been in charge of my colleague [Mr. BURNHAM]. The Senator from Minnesota complained to-day that he had not secured the passage of a bill for three or four days. My colleague has been in this Chamber for several months trying to get consideration of this bill, and there has been intense hostility displayed toward it. I consulted with my colleague a day or two ago as to this matter of a grant of public lands, and, if I remember correctly, he said to me that this bill did not alienate any public lands beyond what the general bill does, to which the Senator from North Dakota alludes. Am I correct?

Mr. NELSON. Except in one particular. It gives them a little more land at the terminal points by paying for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. At the terminals. That is precisely what my colleague told me.

Mr. NELSON. That is all there is about it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. This bill is in the usual form, as I understand. They merely grant land to the width of 200 feet.

Mr. NELSON. That applies under the general law.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The only point I make is that they ought not to grant the public land. For that reason I thought the bill should go to the Public Lands Committee. I may be mistaken about it.

Mr. NELSON. Since I have been here a number of railway bills for Alaska have come before the committee, several of them providing for extensions of time. All of those bills relating to rights of way in Alaska and for extensions of time have gone to the Committee on Territories. Beyond giving a little extra land for terminal purposes, this bill contains no land grant at all.

I want further to state to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH]—and I will say for the information of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], also—that the parties who are interested in this charter have explored that country from Copper Center down to Valdez, a distance of 100 miles. They have made a preliminary survey and a plat and spent $2,000. While this bill has been pending here some parties who are interested in the White Pass Railroad, a Canadian railroad running from White Pass through Skagway up to White Horse on the Yukon River, have gone lately, within the last two months, have filed a plat here, and they pretend that they are going to build. Their object is to prevent the Americans from building a road and getting that traffic in their hands. Their representatives have been here, and some parties have called me out into the Marble Room to see about it. When the time comes, I will give the Senator from North Dakota more information on that subject. I do not desire to discuss it further now.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do not care about any of the information which the Senator has concerning the matter.

Mr. NELSON. It is a little surprising to me that anyone should think that there was any danger in incorporating an American company to build an American line instead of allowing a Canadian company to come in here and block it. They have got a charter. They have incorporated under the laws of Alaska, and they have gone on and incorporated under the laws of some other State—I forget what State, though I have heard; I think it was Nevada, but I am not certain about that—they have gone on and secured an incorporation, and they have come in here just to block this American company, composed of our own people. That is the long and short of the matter.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. There were other Senators, I think, opposed to this bill besides myself. There were several on the Democratic side, among them the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; I know them.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. So I hope the Senator when he gives this startling information which he is going to give—and I never heard of it before—will give it to all Senators.

Mr. NELSON. I thought that, inasmuch as one Senator entered on a personal explanation regarding this matter, I would make a little explanation.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am very glad the Senator did. Mr. President, I will call the Senator as a witness to this feature of this controversy, and that is that I did not ask that this bill be laid before the Senate. I think the Senator will agree with me that that is true. That is the principal point in this newspaper item to which I object.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I do not know why the Senator from Minnesota thought proper to bring my name into the discussion. I was opposed——

Mr. NELSON. I will state to the Senator it was because every time the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM] has attempted to call the bill up either the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] or the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], if I remember aright, have objected.

Mr. CARTER. I think the RECORD will not show any objection made by me to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think the RECORD will show that I made one objection. I shall make another when the time comes.

Mr. CARTER. I was opposed to the bill, which I understand the committee has abandoned. I was opposed to it because it presented a proposition in contravention of the settled policy of the Government of the United States with reference to the public waters of the bays and inlets and harbors of the country. It provided that the parties receiving this grant might select 2,600 acres of land on Golofnin Bay and be entitled to the tide lands in connection therewith. There was no limitation as to the width or the proportions of the selection. This Golofnin Bay I know not of save from common report. It is said to be a good harbor. It was very obvious to my mind that 2,600 acres of land, selected in a shoestring form, might be stretched around any harbor in the country so as to completely control it.

Again, it gave a grant of coal lands, but it did not appear from the bill that the incorporators had any investment at all. It did not appear that any survey had ever been made. It is not important that that bill be discussed, because, as I understand, it has been abandoned by the committee itself.

As to the bill now pending, I have no objection to it, as I have not read it. I understood the committee had reported some bill as a substitute for the one originally presented to the Senate. I do know that there is a liberal law with reference to railway rights of way; that that law is general, and that persons desiring to incorporate under it are not restricted, either as to the State where they may incorporate or as to the capitalization of the company.

In due time the bill now under consideration will come up, and I have no doubt it will prove a very great improvement upon the bill as originally reported. I have nothing to say about the pending bill.

Mr. NELSON. I want to correct the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. I understand the Senator has concluded, and I rise in my own right, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. NELSON. I want to correct the Senator from Montana about the first bill. He is mistaken about that. It was not Golofnin Bay. Golofnin Bay is over on the Seward Peninsula—it was Cordova Bay.

Mr. CARTER. Cordova Bay—I stand corrected.

Mr. NELSON. The outer portion of Cordova Bay is very deep water, but right in front of it is much low land—you may call it tide-water land—and without great improvements no railroad could get out to deep water so as to reach a vessel. In order to get a harbor at all, any company would have to expend thousands of dollars to check and restrain a number of glacial streams that flow down there; piles would have to be driven to get a proper footing for a place for connecting the railroad with the ships in the harbor, and a good deal of dredging would have to be done. Whoever builds a railroad from that point will have to expend thousands of dollars to get a terminal. They will have to dredge those tide flats, and they will have to drive piles in some places. They will have to check and restrain a half dozen glacial streams in order to get them into one channel. It will be utterly impossible, without spending even millions of dollars, to get out there to a harbor that will be of any use.

Unfortunately along that coast of Alaska there are few real harbors. The nearest that comes to it is at Valdez, away up in the interior, back farther in the upper end of what is known as Prince William Sound. The great misfortune about that harbor is that the anchorage is too deep, while over at Cordova Bay, by extending work out across the tide flats toward deep water, a good harbor can be reached.

In the next place, the bill proposed that these parties should pay for this land; in the next place, it gave them no coal-land grant. It gave them a section of land by paying $10 an acre, the price for which the Senator from Montana can himself go up there and, with four associates, under the general laws of the Territory, locate 640 acres of coal land. That was all that bill proposed to give.

Alaska is a bleak, barren, mountainous, hard country in which to build railroads. It has few permanent settlers, and without giving encouragement to some railroad company it is difficult to get any railroad built. Some years ago a railroad was started from Resurrection Bay up the Kenai Peninsula. They have been trying to get up some 156 miles to the Matanuska coal fields. They have not got even as far as Turnagain Arm yet. They have spent two million and a half dollars to get about 40 or 50 miles of road built. They are utterly stranded and helpless, and we have got a bill here to extend the time for the construction of the road.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly; I always yield to the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SCOTT. I understand the House of Representatives has taken a recess until 7 o'clock, and I move that the Senate now take a recess until half past 7.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I would suggest that my colleague has not finished his speech.

Mr. NELSON. I am quite satisfied. I will finish the speech next session.

Mr. BACON. I desire to inquire of the Senator if he thinks that at 7 o'clock the two Houses will be in a position to bring business to a close. If so, I would rather have the recess to 7 than to half past 7.

Mr. SCOTT. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that my impression is that we shall be here until 9 o'clock. I may be mistaken. I withdraw my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is withdrawn.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 7 o'clock this evening.

Mr. BACON. There is no probability in the world, from what I can learn, that at 7 o'clock the business will be in such shape that we can conclude.

Mr. KEAN. I am informed that by a quarter of 7 the House will have the bill, for which we are waiting, in readiness.

Mr. NELSON. Will it be enrolled by that time?

Mr. KEAN. The Speaker so informed me.

Mr. HALE. They have been saying that ever since 12 o'clock.

Mr. SCOTT. That is it. We had better take a recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. BLACKBURN. We have been here all day waiting on the pleasure of the House. It seems to me the Senate might now exercise some judgment of its own. If we meet here at 7 o'clock, to judge by our experience, we will have to wait here either patiently or impatiently until 9 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. I am told that the delay is owing to the inefficiency of the Printing Department. They have not had capacity enough, although they have had hours enough, to get the bill ready for the House; and that is a matter which hereafter we ought to deal with in our relations with the Printing Department. They have shown an entire lack of capacity in this matter and an entire lack of appreciation of the situation, and instead of, as has been done heretofore, under other management, sending bills up here early, they have taken their own time, and our delay is simply owing to the incapacity of the Printing Office.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let me suggest to the Senator from Maine that I understand the House has taken a recess until 7 o'clock. Now, what need of the Senate being here at 7? We surely will get nothing at that hour. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock and let Senators have a chance to get their dinner and come back.

Mr. HALE. I suppose we will get something pretty soon after 7 o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine will suspend, to enable the Senate to receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 20511) making appropriations for certain public buildings authorized by the act approved June 30, 1906, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 20511) making appropriations for certain public buildings authorized by the act approved June 30, 1906, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. Let the bill be considered now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the bill just stated be now considered. It will be read for the information of the Senate.

The bill was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. WARREN. I will ask the Secretary to look and see if Colorado Springs is included in the bill. I presume it is, but I missed it.

Mr. HALE. If it is not there, it can not be put there anyway. We can not send the bill back to conference.

Mr. WARREN. It may have been an error.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary read every item in the bill.

Mr. HALE. Let the Senate act on the bill.

Mr. WARREN. I wish it might wait for a minute.

Mr. HALE. Supposing the item is not in the bill, does the Senator propose to send the bill back to conference?

Mr. WARREN. I had an idea that we might amend it.

Mr. HALE. We have waited on the House for hours and hours, Mr. President.

Mr. KEAN. And we will wait for hours and hours more.

Mr. WARREN. I will not delay the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECESS.

Mr. HALE (at 6 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate take a recess until fifteen minutes past 7 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess the Senate reassembled.

ENROLLMENT OF BILLS.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senate has been very patient and very faithful in attending to its business in these last days of the session and has waited patiently during the day, getting the information from time to time that the closing bills which are necessary to be passed would be sent here, and that action would be completed and no further delay result. The President of the United States has come here with his Cabinet to scrutinize bills before signing them, and after waiting, as I have never known a President to do before, for hours and hours, has naturally and with good reason left the Capitol, and the final messages will have to be sent to him.

Mr. President, I do not know where the fault is. I do not conceive that it is here. I am certain that the House of Representatives and its committees are as desirous of closing the session as the Senate can be. But there is a grave fault somewhere. The situation that we are in is unusual; I think unprecedented. I have been greatly disturbed because the great sundry civil appropriation bill, which the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate had in charge, was, in the absence of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who I hope will at no long day in the future be restored to the field of his great work and services here, committed to my charge.

One of the things in controversy upon that bill was the $3,000,000 appropriation for the acquisition of land on the southern side of Pennsylvania avenue, to be condemned or bought for the erection of much-needed public buildings for the Department of State, Department of Justice, and the Department of Commerce and Labor. I for one was greatly interested. The matter has been up here, and as the Chair will remember it was up in the previous Congress. The Committee on Appropriations put the clause in the bill and reported it. But great opposition was developed in the House, and I felt and the committee felt that while it was a proper public measure and that it would be a good thing for Congress to adopt, as the House had not put it on the bill, and as the Senate had put it on, and the House conferees squarely and determinedly stated that that body would not agree to it, the Senate must recede and give it up. I have here the official report of the presentation of the conference report on June 29:

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I submit the final conference report on the sundry civil bill.

Which ended it so far as our committee is concerned.

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 4, 5, 14, 22, 47—

And following twenty or thirty other amendments.

I turn to the copy of the bill, and I find upon page 10 the amendment numbered 5—building for the Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce and Labor—and a somewhat extended provision following to enable the Secretary, in his discretion, to condemn the site below the Avenue. In terms and as conclusively as it is possible for the Senate to act it discarded that amendment and it went out under the report made to the Senate, which I have quoted. But notwithstanding that, Mr. President, in the official enrolled copy of the bill amendment No. 5 in terms, instead of disappearing as the Senate directed that it should disappear, appears as a part of the enrolled bill and of the law.

It awakens not only surprise but solicitude that anything of that kind should happen after a complete scrutiny, after official action. This thing occurred and was only detected, I will not say by accident, in examining the bill before it was signed by the President, and it is found that this clause, instead of being eliminated and disappearing under the waters of Congressional dissent, is in the text of the bill, and the two bodies of Congress have been obliged to pass—and have, I am glad to say, without question passed—a joint resolution, approved by the President, correcting this error and, if it become law by the President having formally affixed his signature, repealing that clause, so that it is out of the bill. But it has given me a good deal of trouble, not, as the RECORD shows, that there is any fault on the part of the committee or of the clerks in making it up, but it is in the enrollment.

Mr. President, I do not know what the enrolling force is. I do not know who constitute it. I have no prejudice against it. I do not know how many men compose that force. It has never been up to me to investigate it. But I do know that a thing of this kind ought not to occur.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I wish the Senator would let me complete my statement. Still I will yield.

Mr. NELSON. I was going to suggest that the enrollment now is done at the Government Printing Office, is it not?

Mr. HALE. I say I do not know where it is done. I do not know who is engaged in it.

Now, I can see and Senators can see that here is a matter of great controversy. Here is a condemnation or purchase of I do not know how many tracts—twenty or thirty or fifty, perhaps a hundred different tracts of land—and the two Houses throw out the clause, and yet it appears afterwards as being in the law. Suspicions are very easily engendered; the newspapers are not wholly without fault in nourishing suspicion and in attributing sinister motives to Congress, and if this had not been discovered, and if it had been found, after adjournment, that it was in the bill, I do not know how many men or how many newspapers or how many correspondents would have said that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT], in charge of the public buildings bill, and I, who for the time being was in charge of these appropriations, and the Secretary of State, who has urged this earnestly, had quietly submitted to its insertion.

I do not think any implication of that kind would have affected any of us here, but I am very glad that we escaped it. Whoever is accountable for this, it ought hereafter never to take place. I am not certain but that in the future there ought to be a special committee to examine into the final stages of a bill after it has passed the Senate to see that the enrollment corresponds to the action of Congress.

Mr. CARMACK. This was a House bill. It was enrolled in the House, I understand.

Mr. HALE. I am not going into that, Mr. President. I do not know——

Mr. CARMACK. I think it proper that that fact should be known, so that if there is any fault it may appear where the fault is located.

Mr. HALE. I am so desirous of doing no injustice to anyone that I do not seek to locate the fault. It is a very grave one and might have embarrassed the Senate very greatly. It was luckily discovered, and it has been corrected.

I am by no means certain we should not hereafter properly create a committee of experts, not a large committee, but one whose duty it would be to examine the enrollment of bills. We have a Committee on Enrolled Bills, but I do not suppose that committee ever pays great attention to these matters, but formally passes them up to the desk of the presiding officer to be signed.

Always with the naval appropriation bill I have directed the clerk of the committee to follow the bill after it has passed both the House and Senate and has been agreed to in conference to see that the enrollment has in it nothing but what the two Houses have agreed to and that no mistake has been made in indicating an amendment by number, as amendment No. 5 in this case, which, instead of being put into the items rejected, was put into the items accepted. In that way I have tried to see that the naval appropriation bill is stripped of any defect of this kind. As I said, I do not know but we shall be obliged to do that in all cases.

Upon this matter, Mr. President, without in any way locating the fault, but showing where it is not to be placed, as I have read the RECORD, I present the following resolution, which I ask may be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine submits a resolution, which will be read by the Secretary.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be directed to examine into the clerical force engaged in the enrollment of bills passed by Congress and to report to the Senate whether said force needs to be reorganized in order to secure accuracy and efficiency in its work.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, I think this particular error ought to be examined into. The resolution proposed by the Senator from Maine of course does not look to that, but I think this particular case ought to be inquired into.

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt the Committee on Rules, because this is the occasion of the resolution, will begin its investigation by looking into the circumstances attendant on this bill.

Mr. CARMACK. But that is not provided for in the resolution.

Mr. HALE. I do not think it needs to be provided for.

Mr. CARMACK. It may not be necessary.

I merely wish to say, Mr. President, that I do think this matter ought to be inquired into. It may have been, and probably was, simply an error, an oversight, a mistake; but I know it has occurred again and again in the legislature of Tennessee, and I have no doubt it has occurred again and again in the legislatures of other States, that bills have been fraudulently changed and practically a law enacted by a simple twist of the wrist on the part of sombody who was paid to do it fraudulently. I do not mean to charge that anything of that sort happened in this case. I do not think it did; but still that is possible. This matter, I think, ought to be carefully inquired into. If the resolution of the Senator is such as to require an investigation into this particular case I am satisfied with it.

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt it is.

Mr. CARMACK. It ought to be done, unquestionably.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have another resolution to offer. Both these resolutions take root in the embarrassment that has come by reason of this unusual delay. I do not know how many Senators have asked me why it is that when it was supposed we could adjourn early this morning we were told we could adjourn at half past 12, and then at 3, and then at 6, and then at 8, and yet the bills do not appear. One reason and another has been given.

I do know this, Mr. President, that for the first time in my experience here it has been difficult to get bills that come here from the House and are ordered to be printed up before the committees acting on them in the time in which we have ordinarily had them. The Printing Office has been heretofore quite a model in that regard. I have sometimes been surprised at the celerity with which when a bill has been sent there it is printed and returned here with the amendments numbered. In the last days of the session this is essential, not only to the comfort of members of this body, but to the interests of legislation.

This year, for the first time, it has been hard work to get anything out of the Printing Office. On one of the important bills that we had we waited and waited, and at last the Committee on Appropriations had to go to work and consider an old print, having nothing more, in order to transfer our amendments to the new print, and we could get no satisfaction from the Printing Office for the delay.

I do not know where the cause is. I know that it occurs now for the first time. It has been suggested to me that the new management in the Printing Office is so largely engaged in other reforms and in securing to itself additional jurisdiction that it believes in these matters it is the business of the Congress to wait on the convenience of the Printing Office instead of their waiting on our convenience. A veteran Senator who has had charge of an appropriation bill nods his assent to this, and quite likely other Senators. It is a part of the thing that we are meeting, the disposition on the part of outside organizations not, as I have said, to wait on the convenience of Congress, but to make us wait on their convenience. That is all wrong. It is absolutely different from the theory that should obtain.

These Departments beset us for appropriations, for increased appropriations, for new clauses, and they hammer at the gates of our committee, and when we decide against them they entreat and implore us to change our decision and give them what they want, all upon the theory that it is for them to decide on these great questions of appropriations what is needed and not for Congress. I think the Senate is very tired of that. Without localizing in this case—I do not know who is at fault; Mr. Brian has been there for years; there never has been any trouble heretofore; I never before had any trouble in getting early reports—I submit this additional resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine submits a resolution, which will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be directed to inquire into the reasons for the delay in the Government Printing Office in sending to the Senate, especially in the last days of the session, printed copies of bills and joint resolutions pending and awaiting action on the part of Congress.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not know of anything better that can be done when a grievance arises than to try to remedy it. I do not wish here to do any injustice to the Public Printer or to anybody. I know very little about it. He has had no experience in the Printing Office here before. He was brought here and put at the head of it, but has had a good reputation elsewhere, and he is said to be a faithful, competent man. But I am afraid he does not realize the importance, particularly in the last days of a session, of letting other work go and attending to the calls of Congress for the copies of bills that are necessary to be placed upon the desks of members in order that we may legislate with information and with understanding.

I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I listened with very great interest and a high degree of appreciation to all the Senator from Maine said. I thought he said very wisely and very properly, under all the circumstances, that the fault is one necessary to be located, and he would not undertake to locate it. But I do think the Senate ought to know, in view of all that has been said, where at least it should not be located. I rise to make the inquiry that I may learn if possible whether or not any of this fault is to be located in the Senate, if the Senator can tell us.

Mr. HALE. Perhaps the Senator was not present when I read from the RECORD upon the particular case.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; I was present and heard it.

Mr. HALE. Showing that the fault was not in the Senate or in the committee or with the clerks of the committee.

Mr. CULLOM. Of the Senate?

Mr. HALE. Of the Senate. Now, that is as far as I know. I can not go beyond that.

Mr. FORAKER. I only wanted to know whether or not it was possible that any of this fault was to be located in the Senate. I did not imagine that it could be, and I am gratified to know that it is not.

Mr. HALE. I suppose, as I have already said in reply to the Senator from Tennessee, that when the committee which will be intrusted with this investigation begins its work the first thing it will do will be to take up this particular, significant incident, which was the occasion of the resolution.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I merely want to say that it was suggested to me by a Senator a moment ago—I knew it before, but I had forgotten about it—that the Public Printer has been very ill for some weeks, and that may be the cause of the delay, if anything is attributable to the Printing Office at all. I do not know enough about the situation to know where it does belong, but I do want to give credit to the fact that if there has been any neglect there, the Public Printer has been ill and could not give the matter that attention he would perhaps otherwise have done.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know anything about the matter at all, but I felt that it was due to the clerical force of the Senate, and to everybody else connected with the Senate, that there should not be any room left to locate it with them.

Mr. CARMACK. Of course the illness of the Public Printer might absolve him from any personal blame in this matter, but it does look like the office there ought to be so well organized that the personal presence of the Public Printer ought not to be necessary in a matter of this sort. While that may absolve the Public Printer himself it appears that the office ought to be well enough organized for work of this kind to go on properly and expeditiously without any trouble, even though he may be ill and absent.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL.

Mr. HALE. Senators inquire when we may expect the last bill to be enrolled—the public buildings bill—from the House. I am told that whenever a copy arrives it is found to contain errors which have to be remedied. I do not know what the errors are. I think the House is laboriously striving to send us that bill, which is the only measure keeping us here. It is a very important bill, and everybody understands that it must be passed. It is a tax upon the patience of Senators to ask them to wait, but I think we must ask Senators to wait until we receive that bill and act upon it. When that is done and the bill is sent to the President there is nothing else to prevent an immediate adjournment. I do not think anybody wants to put the matter over until Monday, because that would keep Senators here who want to leave the city to-night or to-morrow. While it is disagreeable, I think we have got to await the action of the House until they complete the bill.

I shall hope that whenever there is a public-buildings bill again somebody in considering the bill will look to it that it is prepared with the care and attention and faithful detail with which we prepare, I will say, appropriation bills, which have sometimes a thousand items in them, so that we may not be submitted to the spectacle we have been submitted to to-day and be asked to continue along indefinitely in the evening, which I fear we will now have to do.

I am told that the House means to perfect the bill and to send it to us to-night and not adjourn. I have known cases where we have awaited the action of the House until almost midnight, and I think we will have to do that now.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I feel sure that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] does not intend to reflect upon either the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds or its employees.

The history of the public-buildings bill is something as follows: It is a House bill and its consideration was entered upon almost seven months ago by the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It was finally perfected, as that committee thought, put under lock and key, and I am informed to-day that it was taken out by that committee and revamped and altered from time to time, and again put back under lock and key until finally unlocked and passed by the House. In the meantime the Senate nor any of its members were in possession of the terms of the bill. It reached this body, if I am not mistaken, somewhere about 5 o'clock on Wednesday afternoon of this week. It got to the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in season for that committee to get to work on it at 8 o'clock Thursday night. The bill was amended, brought back to the Senate the next day, and passed shortly after the opening of the session.

In other words, the committee had it in its possession much less than twenty-four hours. It went to conference, reached the committee of conference at a late hour on Friday night, and was finished the next morning—to-day, Saturday—at 10 minutes past 10. In the meantime there had been a disagreement reported, a second conference had, and our work as conferees completed.

Now, with nearly seven months in a committee on the other side, I submit, forty-eight hours was rather a short time for the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate for this great, vexatious omnibus bill.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, the bill, as far as we know now, has no errors on account of that short time and the haste of the committee of the Senate, but in enrolling the bill I am informed that nearly every sheet has been sent back to the Printing Office for errors, and some of them more than once.

So, wherever the delay is, it is not on the part of the Senate, its committee, the committee clerks, or, so far as I know, of any of the employees, and we in our forty-eight hours seem to have done our work as well as they did theirs in seven months.

I will say, however, as I may seem to reflect upon the work of the House committee, that, in my judgment, we have never had sent us as good a bill in the way of an omnibus public-buildings bill as the one the House sent us this year. The House committee deserves credit for this, and I believe the Senate may congratulate itself, and Congress and the country, upon this bill as being the most valuable bill we have ever had in the way of an omnibus public-buildings bill, in that it is not a large amount—some $23,000,000, or a little over. It covers a great many places and will erect a great many suitable buildings for public use.

Mr. HALE. Needed buildings.

Mr. WARREN. Needed buildings. But instead of voting, as we have sometimes done, $150,000 or $200,000 for a given town, for a given post-office only, we have given, say, $50,000 to $100,000; where post-office, court-house, land offices, from $75,000 to $150,000, and we have obtained assurances from the Treasury Department that it can conform to these sums and erect the needed useful buildings by leaving off, perhaps, a little of the ornamentation and some of the furbelows, but giving us all the solids, all the real values, all the working room, and, in fact, all of the substantial qualities necessary to give a building not only a good, wholesome, substantial appearance, but as long a life as if we spent a good deal more upon it.

Now, Mr. President, in looking about we find the buildings that have been built in Washington, where the most ornamentation was put upon them, are to-day the furthest out of date. The buildings that were built plainly and elegantly, as a number of them were, like the Patent Office, we will say, the Treasury building, are to-day in my judgment, away above and beyond in their appearance those of a later date that, in the ornamental stage, had hundreds of thousands of dollars expended upon the ornamentations.

I recall—and others who have served with me on the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will also do so—that we have been asked heretofore to appropriate $500,000, $600,000, $700,000, and even $750,000 for fresco and other similar ornamentation in public buildings after all but this fancy finish had been completed.

Mr. President, there are not to my knowledge any of the frills and frescoes of a more extravagant age in the present bill. In my judgment we ought to ask the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department to calculate upon plain, substantial styles of buildings for all the towns throughout the United States when the Government is to erect Federal offices. Of course in State capitals and large cities like the great metropolis, New York, we can perhaps be a little more generous in expenditures; but, generally speaking, I think we want good, large, plain, roomy, airy, substantial buildings. We can get along without marble halls or marble walls in a large majority of cases and use sandstone, limestone, or other good strong material. It is not necessary that the marble should be 8 or 9 feet high in the wainscoting around the rooms where 3 feet will do, and so on.

Mr. HALE. Does either of the Senators know which body assented to the conference?

Mr. WARREN. The House assented. The Senate asked for the last conference.

Mr. HALE. Is the Senator sure of that?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Because that will make a difference in the proposition of our taking a recess.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that the Senate last night reported here a disagreement, the House waiting. The Senate insisted, and appointed conferees and asked for a conference. The House agreed to it.

Mr. HALE. Then there is no doubt that the report will be submitted in the House first.

Mr. WARREN. In the House first.

Mr. HALE. Then I will make my motion for a recess after we hear from the House.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, this delay is vexatious. I regret it very much, wherever the fault may be; but I want to say that if we shall find when this bill is signed and becomes a law somebody's building is left out, or if some building for some city or town is provided for in one bill but is not appropriated for in the other, we must remember that the Senate had something like forty-eight—certainly not seventy-two—hours to do all its part, and that the final work upon it—that is, the enrollment—clerks and others have had to do at late hours, after long, hard sessions in very warm weather. We must put up with the general proposition that the bill, as a whole, is the best one we have ever had and is tending toward improvement so far as the number of buildings is concerned and more frequent public-building bills, because of the economies of this bill.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am informed by a veteran Member of the House of Representatives that the House has appointed its members of a joint committee to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that Congress is ready to close its session, that it has passed a resolution for final adjournment at 10 o'clock to-night, and has taken a recess until 10 minutes to 9 o'clock in order to take up the enrolled bills. So I present the resolution which I send to the desk, and I wish to say to the Chair that although I present the resolution I will not be able to serve on the committee. I therefore ask that the Chair appoint some other Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution proposed by the Senator from Maine will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Vice-President, to join a similar committee appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses, having completed the business of the present session, are ready to adjourn unless the President has some other communication to make to them.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the resolution just adopted, the Chair appoints as members of the committee on the part of the Senate the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am told that the Senator from New Hampshire is not here and is not likely to be here this evening. In looking around, my eye falls upon the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of the Senator from New Hampshire, the Chair will appoint the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I will not yet ask that the Senate take a recess until 10 minutes to 9 o'clock, as the House has done, but I will wait to see if we get a message from the House announcing the appointment of the committee to wait upon the President and fixing the time for final adjournment. As I have already stated, I am told that the other House has fixed the time at 10 o'clock to-night. My impression is that the Senate, without extended debate, will accept that and be very thankful for it.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution authorizing the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 30th day of June, 1906, at 10 o'clock p. m.; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a resolution appointing a committee of three Members to join a similar committee appointed by the Senate to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses had completed the business of the present session and were ready to adjourn unless the President has some other communication to make to them.

The message also announced that the Speaker had appointed Mr. PAYNE, Mr. BURTON of Ohio, and Mr. WILLIAMS as members of the committee on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 20511) making appropriations for certain public buildings authorized by the act approved June 30, 1906; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I ask that the House resolution relating to final adjournment be laid before the Senate. It is customary to refer such resolutions to the Committee on Appropriations; but there is no need of doing that now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 30th day of June, 1906, at 10 o'clock post meridian.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. HALE (at 8 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.). Now, unless there is some enrolled bill or a bill that is not enrolled, or is not likely to be enrolled right, I move that the Senate take a recess until ten minutes past 9 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at 9 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION ACT.

On motion of Mr. LONG, it was Ordered, That 1,000 additional copies of the Indian appropriation act be printed for the use of the Senate.

RECESS.

Mr. KEAN (at 9 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.). Mr. President, I do not see that any business is doing at the present moment; and I suggest that the Senate take a recess for ten minutes, in the hope that there may be something from the other House by the expiration of that time.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at 9 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 20410) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

ADDITION TO ROCK CREEK PARK.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In compliance with the terms of section 25 of an act entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1906, the Chair appoints as the committee referred to in the section relative to the advisability of purchasing the proposed addition to Rock Creek Park the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

At 9 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m. Mr. NELSON and Mr. BLACKBURN, the committee appointed on the part of the Senate to wait upon the President of the United States, appeared, and

Mr. NELSON said: Mr. President, the committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to join a similar committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States and notify him that Congress is ready to adjourn and to ascertain whether he may have any further communications to make to Congress, beg leave to report that we communicated with the President, informed him that Congress was ready to adjourn, and inquired whether he had any further communications to make, and he informed the committee that he has no further business to present to Congress.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS ACT.

On motion of Mr. KEAN, it was Ordered, That 1,000 additional copies of H. R. 20410, to limit the cost of public buildings, etc., as approved, be printed for the use of the Senate.

THANKS TO THE VICE-PRESIDENT.

Mr. BLACKBURN (at 9 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.). Mr. President, it affords me a great deal of pleasure to offer for the adoption of the Senate a resolution that I will send to the desk expressive of the appreciation of this body for the courtesy, efficiency, fairness, and ability with which its presiding officer has discharged the duties of his station.

In offering this resolution, Mr. President, I feel assured that it but gives expression to the sentiment of each and every member of this body. In all the years that I have been here I have never known an occupant of that chair who more richly deserved this tender of appreciation from those over whose deliberations he presided.

I ask that the Secretary read the resolution that I offer for the adoption of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON in the chair). The Secretary will read the resolution submitted by the Senator from Kentucky.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate are hereby tendered to the Vice-President for the dignified, impartial, and courteous manner in which he has presided over its deliberations during the present session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution which has been read by the Secretary.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

ADDRESS OF THE VICE-PRESIDENT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT having resumed the chair, and the hour of 10 o'clock p. m. having arrived,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Senators, I shall always hold in grateful remembrance the resolution you have adopted personal to myself. Permit me to express to you my deep sense of obligation for the uniform courtesy, kindness, and assistance which the Chair has received from both sides of the Chamber.

The session which is closing has been a protracted and arduous one. Great questions have been debated in a manner worthy of the best traditions of the Senate. Many sharp differences of opinion have been disclosed in the progress of the discussions, but they have been only such as must naturally arise in a forum where public measures of magnitude are determined after mature deliberation. There has been, of course, entire accord among Senators in patriotic purpose.

I trust that at the close of the vacation upon which you are about to enter you may return safely and in health to resume your important service in behalf of the Republic.

The hour for the adjournment of the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress having arrived, it becomes my duty to declare the Senate adjourned without day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 30, 1906.

[Continuation of legislative day of Friday, June 29, 1906.]

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 10.55 by the Speaker.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following joint resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota offers a joint resolution, and asks unanimous consent for its present consideration. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 188) making an additional appropriation for expenses under the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $81,597.33 for additional expenses of the Interstate Commerce Commission during the fiscal year 1907, authorized under the act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words by way of explanation. The Interstate Commerce Commission last night sent me an estimate of the amount that would have to be added to their appropriation in consequence of the passage of the rate bill. The amount estimated was $97,916.80. Later I received a letter from the Commission saying that in the event of the passage of the resolution requiring that the bill should not take effect until sixty days from the date of approval it would be necessary to carry only five-sixths of the amount estimated, and the amount in the joint resolution is exactly the amount estimated by the Commission on account of the rate bill going into effect sixty days from the date of its approval.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAWNEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am informed that last evening, on the agreement to the report on the general deficiency bill, a motion was not made to reconsider and lay that motion on the table. I wish to enter that motion.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection..

PRINTING COPIES OF RAILROAD RATE LAW AND PURE-FOOD LAW.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following House resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That there be printed for the use of the House of Representatives 15,000 copies of the railroad rate law and 15,000 copies of the pure-food law as enacted at the present session of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman will these copies be distributed through the folding room?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. They will be distributed through the folding room.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

CLARA A. R. DEVERAUX.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Invalid Pensions from the further consideration of the following bill, and that it be passed under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks to discharge the Committee on Invalid Pensions from the further consideration of the following Senate bill and to consider the same at this time. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 6283) granting an increase of pension to Clara A. R. Devereux.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Clara A. R. Devereux, widow of Arthur F. Devereux, late colonel Nineteenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GROSVENOR, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

STATEMENT OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent, and before submitting it I wish to make a statement. It has been the custom for a great many years for the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to submit and have printed in the RECORD a statement reviewing the work of Congress in respect to appropriations, together with comparisons with previous years, and it has also been the custom for the ranking minority member of the committee to make a like statement. So far as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is concerned, he has not had time to prepare that statement and submit it before the final adjournment of Congress. I desire now to ask unanimous consent that I may print in the RECORD a statement or a review of the work of the session, so far as the appropriations are concerned, with such comparisons and statements and remarks as I may deem necessary to make in connection therewith.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 19241. An act granting an increase of pension to Henry A. Conant;

H. R. 19926. An act granting an increase of pension to Andrew Leopold;

H. R. 19163. An act granting an increase of pension to Margaret Munson;

H. R. 18545. An act granting an increase of pension to David Upham;

H. R. 17972. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River at or near South Omaha, Nebr.;

H. R. 8825. An act for the relief of Thomas H. Kent;

H. J. Res. 183. Joint resolution providing for printing of reports ordered by the river and harbor act of March 3, 1905;

H. J. Res. 177. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish a bronze cannon, with its carriage, limber, and accessories, to Junction City Post, No. 132, Grand Army of the Republic, department of Kansas; and

H. C. Res. 28. Concurrent resolution providing for a naval review at Tampa Bay during the exposition at Tampa, Fla., commencing in the month of January, 1908.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5221. An act to regulate the practice of osteopathy, to license osteopathic physicians, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia; and

S. 5119. An act authorizing the extension of W and Adams streets NW.

AUTHORIZING SALE OF CERTAIN REAL ESTATE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. RODENBERG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Union Calendar and discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from further consideration of the bill S. 4169, and that the same may be considered at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Union Calendar, discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the following bill; and consider the same at this time. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Chief of Engineers of the Army is hereby authorized to sell at public auction to the highest bidder, provided such highest bid be deemed reasonable and just by the said Chief of Engineers, the house and lot known as No. 204 L street NW., being part of lot 8 in square 558 in the city of Washington, D. C., said house and lot being the property of the United States and now under the charge of the Chief of Engineers in pursuance of section 1797, Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of April 28, 1902.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know what it is and why it is.

Mr. RODENBERG. I will say to my colleague that the report accompanying the bill gives an explanation, and I will read from that. It is very brief:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4169) to authorize the sale of certain real estate in the District of Columbia belonging to the United States, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

This bill passed the Senate on March 12, 1906.

The Acting Secretary of War, under date of February 1, 1906, in a letter to the President of the Senate, makes the following recommendation in favor of the proposed legislation, which authorizes the Chief of Engineers to sell at public auction the property known as 204 L street NW., in this city:

"Under date of December 6, 1904, the United States, through the Department of Justice, obtained possession of the property which had escheated to the United States, for the reason that the owner died intestate and no natural heirs were discovered. This property came into the charge of the Chief of Engineers in pursuance of section 1797, Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of April 28, 1902, and consists of a two-story, four-room and summer-kitchen frame house on the lot, which is now rented to a monthly tenant for $12.30 per month, payable in advance. The Engineer Department reports that the house is small and old and that no reason exists why it should not be sold, provided a fair price can be obtained for it.

"The need of this legislation is brought to the attention of the Department by the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, Col. Charles S. Bromwell, and is recommended as desirable by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army."

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman if he has given this his own personal consideration?

Mr. RODENBERG. I can not say that I have. I can not say anything more about it than that it was reported unanimously by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What is the size of the lot?

Mr. RODENBERG. I do not know.

Mr. MANN. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BOND ISSUE OF 1893.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have unanimous consent, not to make any remarks, but to have put in the RECORD a letter from myself to and a reply from Secretary John G. Carlisle in reference to a subject which has been much discussed in this session of Congress and at other sessions of Congress, with reference to the order for printing the plates for issuing bonds in 1893.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman what chapter this is of the continued story?

Mr. BARTLETT. I hope it will be the last, and I think it will be when this letter is read. On the 26th day of May the gentleman from Ohio made a speech in which he incorporated a letter from former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Foster, in which it was intimated, if not stated, that those plates were prepared for the issuance of bonds by the request of the then expected-to-be Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Carlisle. I wrote immediately to Mr. Carlisle, and I desire to have my own letter and the one from him read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I will content myself with putting them in the RECORD, without being read at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to printing the letters referred to? There was no objection.

The letters are as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, May 29, 1906.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
30 Broad street, New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR SIR: The inclosed extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD contains a statement made by Gen. CHARLES H. GROSVENOR, of Ohio, on the 26th instant.

If you feel inclined, I would be glad to know whether or not the references therein made to you are correct. You will recall that the order to the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was issued by Secretary Foster in February, 1893. Mr. GROSVENOR undertakes to create the impression from this letter that this order to prepare the plates for the printing of the bonds was made not for the purpose of meeting a deficit in the public revenues which existed or would exist at the end of the Harrison Administration, but was made at your suggestion.

I write this letter after conferring with Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, as we do not want the statement of Mr. GROSVENOR to go uncontradicted if it is not correct.

I would be glad to have authority to use any reply you may make to this letter.

Very truly, yours, C. L. BARTLETT.

CURTIS, MALLET-PREVOST & COLT,
ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELORS AT LAW,
30 Broad street, New York, June 5, 1906.

Hon. CHARLES BARTLETT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On my return to the city I find your favor of May 29, with its inclosure. Two or three years ago I received a letter from the Hon. Judson Harmon upon the same subject, which I answered, stating, in substance, that I had no connection whatever with the arrangement said to have been made between my predecessor, Hon. Charles Foster, and certain New York banks, by which they were to advance to the Treasury Department the sum of $50,000, or any other amount, in gold or otherwise. I never heard of that arrangement until some months after I had become Secretary of the Treasury, and then my information was derived from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, to which an order had been sent by my predecessor for the printing of the contemplated bonds. I never had any conversation with Mr. Gorman or my predecessor upon that subject, but, according to my best recollection, I had interviews with both of them in relation to the amendment which Mr. Sherman had offered and which is referred to in the letter you inclose to me. I approved of that amendment. In view of the condition of the Treasury Department at that time, it was my opinion that the Secretary of the Treasury should be clothed with the power which the Sherman amendment conferred upon him in order that, if it should become necessary to do so, he might procure gold by issuing and selling a 3 per cent bond instead of bonds bearing 4 per cent and 5 per cent, which were the only ones then authorized by law. In addition to the withdrawals of gold from the Treasury, which were then going on at a rapid rate, the monthly receipts had been for several months previous to that time, and were then, less than the monthly expenditures of the Government, as will be seen by an examination of the official records of the Department.

Yours, truly, J. G. CARLISLE.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolutions of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 188. Joint resolution making an additional appropriation for expenses under the Interstate Commerce Commission; and

H. J. Res. 187. Joint resolution authorizing the purchase of the manuscript of a Digest of the United States Laws and Decisions.

The message also announced that the Senate, in compliance with the terms of section 25 of the act entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1906, the Vice-President had appointed as said committee referred to therein Mr. SCOTT, Mr. GALLINGER, and Mr. BLACKBURN.

JAMESTOWN EXPOSITION.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for five minutes in order to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], who is my very good friend, made a statement on yesterday which did great injustice to the friends of the Jamestown Exposition in this House and elsewhere. I am perfectly sure that the gentleman did not intend to mislead the House or to impute any misconduct to those who in the last Congress advocated the measure which appropriated $250,000 in aid of the naval, military, and marine display in celebration of the Jamestown settlement. His memory, however, as to what took place here in respect to that appropriation is greatly at fault, and his statement on yesterday that the assurance was given Congress that no further sum would be asked at any future time in aid of this great celebration is wholly and absolutely incorrect. In order therefore to correct the erroneous impression made by the gentleman from New York upon those Members of this House who were not in the last Congress and to set the friends as well as the managers of the Jamestown exhibition right before the country, it is my purpose to call attention to what actually took place when the $250,000 proposition was before this body in the Fifty-eighth Congress. I am sure my friend will admit when I have read what actually occurred that he was totally mistaken. The bill which carried that comparatively small appropriation was passed under a suspension of the rules. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] controlled the time against the measure and led the opposition to it. Let me now read from his speech. He said, among other things:

Although I believe we ought not to go further in this line of expositions or celebrations, I would have been willing to withdraw my objection to this measure on account of the great interest my distinguished friend has in it and the feeling that he has for it, together with the fact that it is located in Jamestown, Va., a location that appeals to every patriotic impulse, if the people interested in the measure would have agreed to limit the demands on the United States Treasury to this $250,000.

Later on in his speech, Mr. LITTLEFIELD said further—I again read from his remarks as printed in the RECORD:

I say that the provisions of this bill as it now stands practically invite a condition that will enable these people to come here later and call for a larger appropriation. And the practical conditions surrounding this question absolutely demonstrate that and justify the suggestion. If it was only $250,000, that is one thing, and if they only want two hundred and fifty thousand, and are willing to limit it to two hundred and fifty thousand, there would be no objection to this provision that I have suggested. But none of the gentlemen interested feel at liberty to agree that they would not come here later for an additional appropriation.

It will be observed that the gentleman from Maine distinctly stated that the gentlemen interested in that appropriation did not feel at liberty to agree not to ask for any further or additional appropriation. But to make it as plain as possible that a further and larger sum would be asked for the gentleman from Maine further said:

And I give this House notice now that this will happen after the proclamation is made: That after the $250,000 have been exhausted we will be responsible for one of the principal features of this exposition. The fact that they refuse to accept this limitation demonstrates that they insist upon being in a position where they can make another demand on the Treasury.

At a later stage in the debate, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], who like the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], was opposed to appropriating the $250,000 carried in the bill unless some assurance was given that no further sum would be asked, said:

The gentleman from Maine has wisely said, I think, that this is but the beginning, but the entering wedge. No Member of this House expects that the Treasury will escape with this meager depletion of $250,000.

Mr. Speaker, these were the declarations made by Mr. LITTLEFIELD, of Maine, and Mr. HEPBURN, of Iowa, both of whom, as I have stated, opposed the $250,000 appropriation upon the ground, and almost wholly upon the ground, that there was nothing in the bill which limited the obligation of the Government to the "meager" sum of $250,000, and no one who supported the measure would agree not to ask more of this Congress.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Was there anything in the bill except for the naval display?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. A naval, military, and marine display. It directed the President of the United States to issue his proclamation and to invite the nations of the world to participate in the celebration.

Mr. PAYNE. To invite the nations of the world to send ships to the naval display?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Yes; that is my statement. There was nothing in the bill that provided for an exposition.

Mr. PAYNE. Nothing in the bill that had any reference to the exposition?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Nothing.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I ask that I may have two or three minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in addition to this, that when this measure came up in the Senate it was in charge of the senior Senator of Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], who was asked the direct question if it was not the purpose of the Jamestown Exposition Company, in the event the bill then before the Senate was passed, to come to this Congress and ask for a further and larger sum. Senator DANIEL replied that he would not undertake to give the Senate any assurance that such would not be the case.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is all I care to say upon the subject. So far from giving the assurances alleged by the gentleman from New York, the very reverse appears from the record to be the case.

I do not intend at all to reflect upon my friend from New York, because I am satisfied he was under that impression or else he would never have made the statement. Now that this Congress has been so liberal, so very generous, toward the celebration of this great event in the history of the American Republic, it may be thought that the subject of my remarks is a "dead issue."

My only object in calling attention to it is that I am not willing that a statement which so unjustly, although I am sure quite unintentionally, reflected upon the fair dealing and good faith of those interested in the Jamestown celebration should go to the country unchallenged and unrefuted. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that I can say for my colleagues, as well as for myself and the Jamestown Exposition Company, that we all feel grateful to Congress for the liberality and great generosity displayed in the appropriation just made. My colleague, Mr. MAYNARD, who has labored so indefatigably, so faithfully, and so intelligently to secure this substantial recognition by Congress of one of the very greatest and most significant events in all our glorious history, feels, I know, profoundly grateful to every Member of this House who has given him aid and encouragement. He is to be congratulated that his arduous and unremitting labors have at length been crowned with such signal success. It is but simple justice to him to say that but for his ceaseless and untiring efforts this measure could never have commanded sufficient support to carry it through this House. The honor is his, and to him we all freely accord it.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know that I shall need more than one minute.

When my attention was first directed to this bill, of which the gentleman from Virginia has just spoken, I was surprised to know that the committee had reported it out, because I had understood that the committee was against it. I made some inquiries about the bill, and I was assured that there was nothing in the bill referring to the exposition or anything that could spell out the future liability of the Government or upon which the Government could be appealed to to enter into the matter.

I had the bill, which, I think, was in typewriting. I do not know that it had been printed then. I saw the bill, and all through it there were allusions to the exposition—I will not say an endeavor to mix the Government up in it so as to make it responsible—but there were some places in it that might be interpreted in that direction. I went to the members of the committee and also to the Speaker of the House, and said to them that my impression of this bill was that it did commit the Government to the exposition. I was told to go through the bill and strike out every such reference at that time, which I did. The bill was afterwards put through the House, not exactly in the form in which I left it, but substantially in that form. Now, I had at the same time expressed my belief, as I did last night, that that was not the end of it; that the Government would be asked for further appropriations. I was assured that it would not. At the same time other gentlemen of of the House had the same impression—that they would ask for further aid and a further appropriation. My friend from Virginia will say——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Was that assurance given to the balance of the House at that time?

Mr. PAYNE. No; I do not think so. I do not think anything was stated in the House.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Because the RECORD does not show that it was.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no. It was in the course of my negotiations, trying to eliminate from the bill any possible responsibility on the Government. But I expressed myself apprehensive then, at least, that the Government would be called upon for further appropriations, and I must say that I was not disappointed as it has turned out. I expect now, notwithstanding I have full faith in my friend from Florida, who is a man of high character and was my friend before he came to Congress—he is a gentleman whom I have always respected—I still think that the Government will be called upon for an appropriation for that exposition. It is the case with all these expositions; they eventually come to Congress. They endeavor to float these enterprises by private subscriptions and by money appropriated by States and municipalities. That gives out, and they come to Congress. It is the history of all these expositions, and my idea from the beginning has been to cut them out at the root. I wanted to cut out this Jamestown business. I did not want that bill to pass, any more than I wanted my friend's bill last night to pass, but I did not propose to put myself in the position of dog in the manger, or of making a single objection, when I knew that a large majority of the House were in favor of the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Does not the gentleman think our action yesterday was a pretty good precedent to establish?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I think the precedent is a good deal like the precedent in the Jamestown matter. We provided for a naval display in the James River in certain months, without referring to the exposition in any way. The bill as originally drawn did refer to the exposition, and the exposition was all mixed up with it; but as it finally passed the House it did not refer at all to the exposition. If it did it escaped my eye and my lead pencil. Now, that is all there is of it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not think the gentleman need have any fear of our coming back here for more money at any time.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope my friend is right, and I hope he will be able to control it. I know if he can he will do so.

Mr. GRAHAM. Do I understand my friend from New York to encourage them to come back?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not. I have already stated my position on that subject.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to have one word to say regarding the passage of the bill. The bill has passed; we have been generously dealt with by this House, and I want to express my deep gratitude, on behalf of myself and the people whom I represent, and the Virginia delegation, for the generous treatment accorded to us by the House of Representatives in the matter of the Jamestown Exposition. [Applause.] In doing this, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the victory we have achieved here in procuring this appropriation to celebrate this great national event—the birth of this nation at the place of its birth—would be robbed of half its sweetness if an imputation that I have dealt in bad faith with this House was allowed to go unchallenged.

Yesterday my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE], in his argument against the Tampa Exposition, said that assurances had been given that if the bill that was passed last winter appropriating $250,000 for this purpose was passed, there would be no further appeal to this House for more aid in behalf of the Jamestown Exposition. I want to disclaim emphatically for myself any promise of any kind as to the future action of myself or my colleagues on that subject. I do not believe that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] desired in the least to be unfair. We know that he is opposed to all expositions and appropriations of this kind, and in the ardor of his desire to defeat it he may have gathered somewhere, I know not where, such an idea; but no one received such an assurance from me. The Speaker of the House and I had many conversations about it. The bill that was passed was put into such shape so as to represent the wishes of the Speaker in the matter, being drawn in the form in which it was presented by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], and I had no part or parcel in drawing it. On the day the bill came before this House for passage I was approached by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD]. He asked me to insert in the bill an amendment providing that we should not come back to this House for further aid for that enterprise. After consultation with my colleagues I emphatically declined to accept such an amendment. Mr. LITTLEFIELD said to me at the time that if we would accept that amendment and incorporate it in the bill, the opposition to that particular bill would be withdrawn. I refused to do it. Later, in conversation with the Speaker, he said to me that he was somewhat surprised at the vote, but would not have been had I incorporated in the bill the amendment of Mr. LITTLEFIELD, which provided that we should not come back here again. I do not know where the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] got his assurances. I am willing to take his word that he got them somewhere, but I do not believe that it came from any of the Virginia Members, because we were all a unit in our determination to make no promises as to what the future would bring forth, because we knew that to celebrate this great national event in a way creditable to the Government it would be necessary for the Congress of the United States to make further appropriations for this purpose.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has always occupied the position toward other expositions, I believe, that he did toward our enterprise. He does all he can to defeat them, but after casting his conscientious vote on the matter I do not see why the gentleman should worry so much about what the rest of us do with the Government's money. [Applause and laughter.]

His attitude on this matter reminds me of a conversation which took place between two colored men in the town where I live. They met on the street, and one of them said to the other: "Sam, do you know I am pestered nearly to death; my wife pesters the life out of me; it is money, money, money, all the time. It is a dollar to-day and two dollars to-morrow and two dollars and a half the next day; she pesters my life out of me." "Jim," says Sam, "what in the world does your wife do with all that money?" Jim says, "I don't know; I never done give her any." [Laughter.] That is the attitude of the gentleman from New York. Whenever a bill of this kind comes up it just pesters the life out of the gentleman from New York; it is money, money, money, all the time; it is money for the exposition—except the exposition in Buffalo—and after it is all over, if anyone asks him what became of the money, the gentleman from New York don't know, because "he never done give them any." [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, as long as there does not seem to be anything else before the Horse, we might as well have a post-mortem. I am the best loser in the world when I am beaten. I try to be cheerful. I have been beaten on the show business for the United States, and still I am no more in favor of it than when we set out in the business. The gentleman delights to refer to the Buffalo case. After they had had their show and the United States had given out to the world that they were behind it, they came in here with $500,000 of claims for the contractors and laborers and people in and about Buffalo which they had no means to pay. That was after the thing was all over, just as I think this gentleman from Virginia will be in here next year.

Mr. MAYNARD. I make no promises. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no; just as I think the gentleman will come here in the aftermath on this subject. I said "post-mortem" a moment ago; we haven't yet got to the post-mortem stage, but in all human probability he will be here when it is all over. Where you have to build docks in order to get near the blamed thing, it is not apt to be a financial success. And yet, when it comes to that, I shall still vote against it, and even if the whole House votes for it, I shall vote against it. While I have not been guilty of giving this money, the House has, and so the negro story hardly applies to me. That is all I care to say upon this, and I regret very much that the country is mixed up in other expositions, as I was when it got mixed up in the town fair in Charleston. I do not know where the next town fair will be located. I do not know but that the fair at Jacksonville, Fla., will be in here for an appropriation for a naval display, all in the interest of inaugurating the digging of the canal across the Isthmus of Panama. They go so far to get something to celebrate; they go so much out of the way to bring the country into it.

I did think, and I think now, that we ought to have had only a fine monument at Jamestown; they ought to have been contented with that, and then if they wanted a show at all, they ought to have had a show at some great center. I would have opposed it, but that would be my advice. They would not accept my advice; the House does not accept my advice as to any of these things, and still I go along making protests and bowing to the will of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. OLMSTED. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will accept the apologies of the gentleman from New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAYNARD. I will—and the appropriation. [Laughter.]

RECESS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess for ten minutes.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 36 minutes) the House was in recess for ten minutes.

At 11 o'clock and 46 minutes a. m., the recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker.

BRIDGE ACROSS COPPER RIVER, ALASKA.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 6523) to authorize the Alaska Pacific Railway and Terminal Company to construct a bridge across the Copper River, in the Territory of Alaska, a similar House bill having been reported as being upon the Calendar, and that it may be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk reported the bill.

The SPEAKER. Under the statement of the gentleman, the Chair will state that the bill is privileged under the order. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Washington, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives, the Senate concurring, of the 20th instant, I return herewith House bill No. 1947, entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to Susan C. Smith."

TOWN SITES IN HEYBURN AND RUPERT, IDAHO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 4862) allowing the settlers with permanent improvements on the town sites of Heyburn and Rupert, in Idaho, to buy the lots on which said improvements are located at an appraised price for cash.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, a bill similar to this has been already passed, and I move that this bill, with the amendments, be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. According to the statement of the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], legislation has been enacted similar to that provided in this bill, and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Idaho that the bill, with amendments, do lie on the table.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess for five minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 1 minute p. m.) the House took a recess for five minutes.

At 12 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m., the recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker.

RECESS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that we take a recess for fifteen minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess for fifteen minutes.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged joint resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 189) to correct an error in enrollment of, and repealing, a certain provision in the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, approved June 30, 1906.

Resolved, etc., That the provision in the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, approved June 30, 1906, appropriating $3,000,000 for the acquisition by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise of a site for the erection of a building for the Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce and Labor, be, and the same is, hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, the joint resolution is privileged.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word in respect to the resolution. This is to correct an error in the enrollment of the sundry civil appropriation bill. The sundry civil bill was amended in the Senate by incorporating a provision for the purchase or by condemnation of a site for a departmental building, and in conference the Senate receded from the amendment, striking the provision from the bill. The conference report showed that the Senate had receded, and up to the point of the enrollment of the bill all of the papers concerning the sundry civil bill eliminated this item, but by some error or mistake in the enrollment of the bill, or in the comparison of the enrolled bill with the bill as finally agreed upon in conference, the item was included, and the bill was thus signed by the President a few moments ago. Just after the signature of the President was attached to the bill it was discovered, and the attention of the Committee on Appropriations was called to the fact that this provision was in the bill as it became a law by the signature of the President. After a conference with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate and the President, it has been deemed best to adopt this method in order to correct the error.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. How long an item on the page was this original item?

Mr. TAWNEY. The item was a complete paragraph covering, I would estimate, about eight or nine lines.

Mr. MANN. Well, was it not longer than that?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, possibly it may have been longer than that.

Mr. MANN. How is it possible for the officers of the House to make a mistake like that in enrolling a bill; and if it was, as it was in this case, possible, what assurance have we that there are not forty other mistakes in the bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois. I only know in this case I have, together with the Clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, traced all of the papers. The conference report eliminates this item, and all of the papers down to the enrollment of the bill have eliminated the item, but by some mistake the bill was enrolled including that item, and it was signed by the President with the item as it was enrolled in the bill, notwithstanding both Houses rejected the item.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman indulge the Chair for a single remark? The Chair is informed, as happens in such cases, that in the great bills and in the press for adjournment the bills very frequently are enrolled prior to their final disposition; and then when they are finally buttoned up, so to speak, by agreement between the House and Senate, sheets are taken out if there be error, and the Chair's information is that in the hurry of work pressing upon the enrolling office that this matter was overlooked and the sheet containing the item was not corrected.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. It is undoubtedly true, of course, as the Speaker has suggested, that bills are often enrolled before they are finally passed, a very proper practice in order to save the time of the House in the final hours of the session, but it seems to me that after a bill is thus enrolled and the conference report is agreed upon there ought to be some method by which there can be a comparison. I have no desire to criticize the gentlemen who are doing the enrolling work. I appreciate the hard labor they have on their hands at the closing days of the session, but we ought to have some method by which we know whether an item is in an enrolled bill or out of an enrolled bill when signed. In this case this item was discovered by accident by one of the Cabinet officers who happened to be looking at it, and if it had not been thus discovered would have gone into the law.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAWNEY, the motion by which the resolution was agreed to, was laid upon the table.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report and ask for its adoption, and ask that the statement be read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] presents a conference report and asks that the statement may be read in lieu of the report. The Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20410) entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20410) entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows: That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 5, 14, 17, 27, 30, 38, 40, 58, 66, 70, 92, and 159.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 120, 146, 149, 150, 151, 152, 154, 161, 163, 164, and 165; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 5, after line 8 of the bill, insert:

"United States post-office and court-house at Evanston, Wyo., five thousand dollars."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 21: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Transfer lines 1 and 2, page 12 of the bill, to page 6, after line 14 of the bill; also transfer lines 1, 2, and 3, page 14 of the bill, to page 7, after line 26 of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 54: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 54, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 11, after line 20 of the bill, insert the following:

"United States post-office at Albuquerque, New Mexico, one hundred thousand dollars."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 84: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 84, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Transfer the matter inserted by amendment No. 88 to page 11, after line 22; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 108: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 108, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

On page 5 of the bill, line 17, after the word "dollars," insert the following: "and for additional amount fifteen thousand dollars."

Also, on page 17 of the bill, after line 18, insert the following:

"United States post-office at New Ulm, Minnesota, thirty-five thousand dollars."

Also, transfer the matter inserted by amendment No. 90 to page 11, after line 26.

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 153: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 153, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 35 of the bill, after line 4, insert the following:

"SEC. 18. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a suitable site for the United States post-office and other governmental offices at Oklahoma City, Territory of Oklahoma: Provided, That thirty thousand dollars of the fifty thousand dollars heretofore appropriated for the acquisition of a suitable site and the erection and completion of a building thereon at said city shall be available for the acquisition, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, of a site only at Oklahoma City, Territory of Oklahoma."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 155: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 155, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 37 of the bill, line 14, after the word "condemnation," insert the words "or otherwise;" and the Senate agree to the same.

RICHARD BARTHOLDT,
EDWIN C. BURLEIGH,
J. H. BANKHEAD,
Managers on the part of the House.

N. B. SCOTT,
F. E. WARREN,
C. A. CULBERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement was read, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20410) to increase the limit of cost of certain buildings, etc., submit the following written statement:

The disagreeing votes of the two Houses were with reference to the following amendments:

No. 5. New York custom-house.
No. 11. New York assay office.
No. 14. Government building, Detroit, Mich.
No. 17. Government building, Columbus, Ohio.
No. 21. Government building, Chattanooga, Tenn.
No. 27. Government building, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.
No. 30. Government building, Duluth, Minn.
No. 38. Government building, Ocala, Fla.
No. 40. Government building, Des Moines, Iowa.
No. 54. Government building, Fernandina, Fla.
No. 58. Government building, Moscow, Idaho.
No. 70. Government building, Boston, Mass.
No. 108. Site for Government building, Denver, Colo.
No. 120. Site for Government building, Minneapolis, Minn.
No. 146. Government building, Richmond, Va.
No. 159. Purchase of a site in the city of Washington for a Department building.

The last amendment was the main obstacle in the way of an agreement, but the managers on the part of the House are now in a position to report an agreement on this item, the Senate having receded.

As to the other fourteen amendments in dispute, the managers on the part of the Senate agreed to the restoration of the House items, and the managers on the part of the House agreed to the items inserted or increased by the Senate. In other words, the Senate recedes on amendments Nos. 5, 14, 17, 27, 30, 38, 40, 58, 66, 70, 92, and 159.

The House recedes on amendments Nos. 11, 21, 54, 84, 108, 120, 146, 149, 150, 151, 152, 154, 161, 163, 164, and 165.

RICHARD BARTHOLDT,
E. C. BURLEIGH,
J. H. BANKHEAD,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BARTHOLDT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20410) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 189. Joint resolution to correct an error in enrollment of and repealing a certain provision in the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, approved June 30, 1906.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1473. An act for the relief of Milinda S. Gray.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 72) fixing the date upon which the act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, approved June —, 1896, shall go into effect.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state for the information of the House that in a few minutes the bill making the appropriations to carry into effect the public-building bill will be prepared and ready to be presented to the House.

Mr. PAYNE. In about how long?

Mr. TAWNEY. About ten minutes.

RECESS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, if there is no other business, I move a recess of ten minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House was declared in recess.

The recess having expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I present the following appropriation bill and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] presents an appropriation bill and asks for its immediate consideration. The Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20511) making appropriations for certain public buildings authorized by the act approved June 30, 1906, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is just to make good the amount required——

Mr. TAWNEY. I will state to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that this bill carries the appropriations estimated by the Treasury Department to be necessary in order to carry into effect the public-building bill which has just been agreed to, and also including the purchase of sites, and also including the appropriations for the work that must be done under the bill during the next fiscal year, which begins to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Made necessary by the changes in the public-building bill as adopted by the house?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; it was made necessary by that fact.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was read at length for amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called to an error in the bill. The word "city" should be stricken out after the word "Pontiac." Also, the word "city" should be stricken out after the word "Dowagiac," Mich. I do not know in what page the places are named. I understand that the public-building bill made this correction by omitting the word "city." There are no places by those names, and the word "city" should be stricken out where those places are stated as being in the State of Michigan.

The SPEAKER. Dowagiac does not seem to be in the bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not verify the statement I made a moment ago that it was in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the word "city" will be stricken out in connection with "Pontiac."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAWNEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RECESS.

The SPEAKER. The House will indulge the Chair for a moment. The Chair is informed, unofficially, that the Senate has taken a recess until 5 o'clock. The Chair supposes it will take an hour or two hours to engross the bill which we have just passed, and probably not much time would be lost. The Senate has yet to act upon this bill, upon the presumption that they will pass it without amendment or with few amendments, and with the work that is to be done on the public-building bill, after inquiry, the Chair is satisfied that the earliest possible moment at which the work could be done, and done properly, would be 6 o'clock; but as the Senate has taken a recess until 5 o'clock, and they might or might not accept the bill without amendment which we have just passed, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the Chair suggest that we take a recess until 6?

The SPEAKER. Better make it 5 o'clock.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House take a recess until 5 o'clock.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the House was declared in recess until 5 o'clock.

The recess having expired,

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 318. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Huron, in the State of South Dakota;

S. 744. An act for the relief of Edward H. Ozmun;

S. 6166. An act for the relief of Edwin S. Hall;

S. 4926. An act for the relief of Etienne De P. Bujac; and

S. 4421. An act for the relief of S. W. Langhorne and H. S. Howell.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 318. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Huron, in the State of South Dakota—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 744. An act for the relief of Edward H. Ozmun—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 6166. An act for the relief of Edwin S. Hall—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 4926. An act for the relief of Etienne De P. Bujac—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 4421. An act for the relief of S. W. Langhorne and H. S. Howell—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1473. An act for the relief of Malinda S. Gray—to the Committee on Claims.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces as members of the Commission appointed by virtue of the provision in the bill authorizing appropriations for public buildings enacted at this session upon the part of the House the following: Mr. BARTHOLDT, Mr. BURLEIGH, and Mr. BANKHEAD.

EXPENDITURES.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, this morning I made a request to print a certain statement in the RECORD concerning the appropriations made by Congress at this session. I have since learned that information has been given out to the public regarding the aggregate appropriations for the session; which statement is inaccurate both as to the amount of the appropriations and as to the estimated revenues for the next fiscal year. While I do not wish to modify the request made this morning, I do desire, if the House will indulge me for a moment, to make a very brief statement and comparison of the appropriations in the aggregate, in order to correct any misinformation that may have been given to the public concerning this very important subject. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the floor.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will therefore say, for the information of the House, that the total appropriations made at this session of Congress, including those carried in the regular annual appropriation acts, all deficiencies, miscellaneous matters, and permanent annual appropriations, aggregate $880,183,301.32.

This is an apparent increase of $60,000,000 over the appropriations made at the last session of Congress.

This apparent excess in appropriations at this session over those made last session is more than accounted for in the three following items:

For the isthmian canal, $42,447,000; under the statehood bill, $10,250,000; toward the construction of new buildings authorized at this session, $10,321,000, making a total of $63,018,000. To these three items I might add an item of not less than $5,000,000 on account of the earthquake and fire at San Francisco.

Other notable increases are $3,000,000 on the agricultural bill for inspection of meat products and $10,600,000 on account of the postal service.

The total apparent appropriations made at this session, $880,183,301.32, do not constitute in their entirety a charge against the revenues of the Government for the next fiscal year, for the reason that there must be deducted from this sum deficiencies that are chargeable to the service of the current year and to meet expenditures already incurred on account thereof approximating at least $35,000,000. This sum includes $16,000,000 for the isthmian canal.

There should also be deducted $57,000,000 for the sinking fund, which may or may not be met in whole or in part, as it is purely a matter of discretion with the Secreary of the Treasury to utilize the surplus in the Treasury for that purpose.

There should also be deducted the sum of $22,000,000, which is estimated and included in the whole sum of appropriations to be paid out of deposits of national banks in redemption of circulating notes of banks. The deposits are not credited as a part of the revenues of the Government, and therefore redemptions made from the fund thus arising should not be charged to expenditures.

The amount of $25,456,415.08 appropriated for work on the isthmian canal during the next fiscal year is payable from or reimbursable to the Treasury out of proceeds of bonds that are authorized to be sold for that purpose and should also be deducted from the sum of appropriations for 1907.

The sums mentioned amount to more than $139,000,000, and when deducted leave apparent appropriations of only $741,000,000 to be met out of the revenues of the next fiscal year.

In my judgment, the ordinary revenues of the Government the next fiscal year will amount to at least $600,000,000. The postal revenues are estimated at $181,573,000 for 1907, making the total apparent resources of the Government next year of not less than $781,573,000, or at least $40,000,000 in excess of appropriations that may be charged against them. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the chairman of the Appropriations Committee has been forced to make this statement. It is a partial statement only. It can not carry to the country, in justice to himself and to the committee and to the Congress, as full an explanation of the appropriations and disbursements of money by this Congress as should go to the country. The sum total mentioned by the chairman is not questionable—more than $800,000,000 of money. And, by the way, let me suggest to you gentlemen who are interested that this is hard on the heels of the appropriations and disbursements of 1899, that carried the bulk of the war expenses. More than $893,000,000 were the disbursements of that Congress through your Appropriations Committee. This is very near to it. I am not prepared or disposed now to apologize for the expenditures of this Congress. I do not think it is necessary to go into detailed statements of expenditures or appropriations in this impromptu manner; but the agreement between the chairman of the committee and myself was that our statements should go out hand in hand together. This will be done on next Tuesday morning, which will be as soon as he can get his statement prepared. Mine is ready now. I want to say this, that his statement here this afternoon is conclusive evidence of one thing, that our friends on the other side of the aisle will not be in favor of revising the tariff soon. If the revenues of the Government should come to the figures that the gentleman from Minnesota has just suggested, more than $700,000,000, it will still be very close to your expenditures. The margin even then between the revenues and disbursements will be too slight to be comfortable to those who insist that our present schedules of taxation must neither be raised nor lowered—stand-patters. You must raise more revenue in some way, either by an income tax or an increase in internal revenues. I put you on notice now that you must do something, and I think my statement will show you your best remedy when you read it.

The estimates referred to by the gentleman are not to be questioned either. I wish to say that your Committee on Appropriations, headed by the gentleman from Minnesota, have done everything within our power to lessen these appropriations for 1907; but you must remember that when you give a committee—the Military Committee, for instance—power to legislate and appropriate also, you take the question entirely out of the hands of the Appropriations Committee, and you must hold them responsible. And then when you take the ten or twelve other committees and give them power to legislate and appropriate, all those committees have to do is to frame their legislation and then appropriate to meet that legislation, without any reference to what other committees are doing. The Military Committee, the Naval Committee, the Post-Office Committee never stop to inquire what other committees are doing in the way of expending money. There is no community or effort between them to keep down expenses or to keep within the limits of the revenue. And yet you expect the Appropriations Committee to do it, when we are absolutely without power.

Mr. HULL. Would it bother the gentleman if I ask him a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No.

Mr. HULL. I do not understand this is the formal statement of the gentleman, and I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks the Committee on Appropriations would meet the appropriations under the law and appropriate what the law required?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the Committee on Appropriations had the appropriations of all the committees this year we would have saved this Government $150,000,000, in my opinion.

Mr. HULL. Would you appropriate under the law all the law requires?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We would not have appropriated all that you legislated in your bill.

Mr. HULL. Why do you give the deficiency? You put in $500,000 this year, so we must have cut down reasonably well.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, as the gentleman at the head of the Military Committee has put himself into the debate, I want to say to him that the most reckless expenditure of money comes from that committee and the Naval Committee of any committees in this House, or that ever has been since the organization of the Government. That committee does not seem to care whether we get $6,000,000 or $10,000,000 of revenue; it has no regard for the amount of money or revenue that we have to draw from.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes; although I do not like to be interrupted.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did I understand the gentleman to say that this was a characteristic of this committee always?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, sir; not always.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then it must be the fault of this particular committee.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No; I want to say that the Committee on Military Affairs is just as able, in my opinion, and just as honest as anybody on the Appropriations Committee. I make no reflection on the committee, either for the want of ability, honesty, or patriotism, but I am finding fault with the whole system of allowing different committees in this House who have no close connection, no understanding as to what the revenues of the Government are, indiscriminately appropriating without regard to the sources from which they must draw. You can not hold the Appropriations Committee responsible for these expenditures under present methods.

The distinguished Speaker of this House that sits in the chair this afternoon in the Forty-ninth Congress demonstrated what I now say beyond the question of a doubt. So did Mr. Randall; so did Mr. Garfield; so did Mr. Edmunds; so did Mr. Beck, and so did many other distinguished Senators and Members on the floor of the House. They begged the House then not to go into these wild and untried methods in their anxiety to divide up the appropriations between twelve or thirteen committees. They foretold then exactly what would happen, what happened to-day, and what will happen in the next Congress and the next, and so on, until you change this system. You never can control your finances under this method of doing business.

The two great committees of the House, one represented by the distinguished gentleman from New York, the Ways and Means Committee, and the other represented by the gentleman from Minnesota, the Appropriations Committee, stand back to back, and they ought to know each what the other is doing. One provides the revenue and the other disburses it, and without some understanding or close connection between these two committees this House has no control of its expenditures.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman pardon me for another question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I take it that the Bureau of Standards is here under the guardianship of the Appropriations Committee. The law creating it limited the expenditure to $27,500 a year, and this year they appropriated about $170,000. What made it grow so?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I am not here to go into details as to the propriety of this or the impropriety of that appropriation. That is a question the gentleman can answer as well as I can.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I thought the gentleman was perfectly familiar with it and he might give us the answer.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will answer it, but I don't want to answer any more questions. The Bureau of Standards was in its infancy four years ago. Two years ago it was a lusty stripling, and now it has got to be a young man, it requires a new suit of clothes. It has grown now to manhood.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; but we had a law which limited it to $27,500, and the appropriation has piled up to about $170,000, and there is no law for it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, there is another thing I want to suggest to the House. When your Appropriation Committee finds in their investigations where we can save a little bit of money and where it ought to be saved, and we put a paragraph into the appropriation bill and come to the floor of this House, every man stands ready—from the Military Committee, or from the Naval Committee, or from some other committee—to jump on it and make a point of order, and out it goes. If you will give us the power to legislate and appropriate as you give the Post-Office Committee, as you give the Military Committee, and as you give the Naval Committee and the other committees, we will take care of it; but you rob us of the power to legislate, and you give it doubly to the other committees to legislate and to appropriate.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken of the sum total of over eight hundred millions appropriated. The sum total appropriated in 1899, which Congress carried the bulk of the cost of the Spanish war to this Government, was only nine hundred and eighty-three million, and in my statement I shall not compare the expenditures of this Congress for 1907 with that of the last Democratic Congress, because it would look ridiculous—$500,000,000 more. I am going to take up the peace term of Mr. McKinley—1898—and compare it with 1907, the peace term of Mr. Roosevelt. I want to say to my Republican friends that this is comparing a Republican administration with a Republican administration, and if you can draw any comfort out of it or give any excuse for it other than that forty-two millions have gone to Panama, you are welcome to do so. But the fact is there all the same. Our extravagance is increasing, if you will pardon the use of that expression, constantly, term after term, and when you meet next winter, somebody on that side of the House, some committee on that side of the House—for it would be no use to try it on this side—should get up some system by which you can not only keep your expenditures within your revenues and get a little surplus on hand for fear we may some day have to tackle some great power with this great Navy of ours that you are preparing, and with which you are walking about, up and down, to and fro, over the earth, with a chip on your shoulder. You will bring it certainly one of these days.

There is one other thought, Mr. Speaker, and I am through. Come back here next winter, my friends on that side of the House—and I hope the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means will listen—come back here with a determination to provide more revenue or cut expenses. You must do one or the other, or resort to a bond issue.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I would not trespass upon the House if it were not for the fact that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] seems to have gone out of his way to take a little throw at all the other committees of the House having appropriations, and I was very much astonished at the statement of the gentleman that the proper way to know how much to appropriate for a given purpose was for some committee to have all of the appropriations, and then, I suppose, draw straws or divide it up equally among all the different branches of the Government. I have been laboring under the impression that every committee having appropriations to report to this House was bound somewhat by the law in each case making necessary the appropriations. So far as the Military Committee is concerned, we are bound by law. We are bound by law to pay the salaries of officers and the wages of the enlisted force of the Army. Would not the Appropriation Committee be bound by the same law? We are bound to provide for the clothing, we are bound to provide for the transportation, we are bound to provide for the food; and it is all under the law. You can not feed an army by a lump sum guessed at by the amount of money the Government may have on hand to distribute. You have got to calculate it by the number of rations, at so much a ration, fixed by law for the number of men entitled to rations, and that is the way the appropriation is made in every other case.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I desire to suggest to the gentleman that his committee is constantly slipping into the bill new legislation providing for more appropriations. That is what I complain of.

Mr. HULL. What? The gentleman ought to know.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Oh, I am not going into details now.

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, a number of them were stricken out this year on points of order raised by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. HULL. That is not a correct statement at all.

Mr. BURLESON. Which gave great offense to the Committee on Military Affairs, and because of which they inaugurated a filibuster against the legislative bill.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] will possess his soul in patience, I will try and enlighten him. There were clerks stricken out to the amount of $300,000 a year. Those clerks were carried on the Army bill when the Committee on Appropriations had the Army bill. It was for division and department headquarters, and Headquarters of the Army. When the Committee on Appropriations had charge of the bill they legislated in their appropriation bill creating a service of enlisted men, and I think it was when Mr. Randall was chairman of that committee that he thought these men got too much wages, and when they reached a certain age they were retired. With their retired pay and pay of new men who took the places of those retired at higher wages than any other enlisted force of the Army had, the cost was considered excessive, and under the leadership of the Committee on Appropriations that law was changed to what it stands to-day—civil-service clerks. That went out on a point of order this session after all these years. There was no law outside of the appropriation bill that had created it. It was created as it stands to-day by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman tell me how the General Staff came into existence, that carries fifty-two line officers of the Army stationed in Washington City, and carries about one and three-quarter million dollars of expense to this Government? How did that get in here?

Mr. HULL. It got in here on a law that passed the Congress independent of an appropriation bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Who put it in here?

Mr. HULL. Why, we have legislated. Why, Mr. Speaker, while the gentleman from Georgia is talking of economy, let me say to him and to the House that if the Committee on Military Affairs had listened to his arguments, and they were most persuasive, at least $500,000 would have been legislated for the benefit of Atlanta.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What are these sixty officers stationed here doing?

Mr. HULL. Why, they are performing the duties of a General Staff; they are studying the different plans in regard to the mobilization of the Army, and they are preparing plans for encampments and all the details of military affairs.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many more officers now are doing that in a time of absolute peace than we had stationed here in the war of 1812, the civil war, or the Spanish war?

Mr. HULL. We did not have any General Staff in the Spanish war. We had simply the bureau officers, and we had simply the general officers. And I will say to the gentleman that the cry all over this country, from the South and the North, was a demand for a better Army organization, so that in case of a war in the future this country would not witness the spectacle of unpreparedness that we had in the case of the Spanish war.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, now, will the gentleman state a single instance where the South or the East or the West, or any other section of this country, called for the stationing of sixty officers in the city of Washington to prepare for war in time of peace?

Mr. HULL. I do not think there are sixty officers preparing for war here.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is what the gentleman from Georgia says.

Mr. HULL. These officers are detailed. I will say to the gentleman I think it is fifty-two, but no matter whether fifty or a hundred, let me say to the gentleman every officer here would be paid exactly the same salary whether he was here or not, whether he is here or in the field. The General Staff does not increase the number of officers.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who is doing his duty in the field while he is here?

Mr. HULL. The subordinates there. If a captain is detailed here, the first lieutenant then is in command. If he is a major, a captain is in command. There is no increase in the Army on account of the details to what is called "the General Staff."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman that 55 per cent of all the money collected as revenues in this Government to-day is appropriated for the Army and Navy in 1907.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, wait a moment.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Wait a moment. This is a larger percentage used for that purpose than any other nation or kingdom under heaven.

Mr. HULL. We do not have any such percentage. I think the English navy alone takes a much larger per cent of the revenue of England than our Army and Navy combined takes of the revenues of the United States.

Mr. PARKER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. PARKER. I know perfectly well that a great many things are counted against the Army which do not have to do with the Army; but the appropriations for the Army are only $70,000,000, a thousand dollars per man, on an average. That is all there is of it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many officers constitute this staff, and where do they work?

Mr. HULL. I think it is fifty-five.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And they are formulating plans that the little subordinates out in the woods and thickets of the Philippine Islands are carrying out?

Mr. HULL. No; I think the gentleman, when he gets a little time, ought to go and look over their work.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where?

Mr. HULL. At the General Staff offices.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am sure I can tell more about what the troops do out in the thickets of the Philippines than I can as to these officers.

Mr. HULL. I think the gentleman could soon learn. I give the gentleman credit for a great deal more ability than would be required for that. As to expenses, we have here an Army of about 60,000, counting all branches and all departments. We have it scattered so it is a little more expensive than it would otherwise be, but the expenses of your Army are about $70,000,000, or, $71,000,000 is about the accurate amount, out of $800,000,000 expended. I am not discussing what the Navy has done. They are not expending a dollar that Congress has not ordered spent.

Mr. BURLESON. We all understand that.

Mr. HULL. When you come to the Army, it seems to me that there is not a man on this floor that represents a constituency—I know that there is not a man on the floor who makes such statements because he believes in the talk—but there is not a man on this floor, in my judgment, that represents a constituency that demands this constant fling at the American Army. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, as I have said so often, the Army of the United States is composed of citizens of the United States, boys that are born and raised in the United States? Under the law that was passed twelve years ago a man can not get into the Army unless he is a native-born citizen or naturalized citizen of this country.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Why, certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. There has been no criticism of the Army, as I understand it. The criticism was directed against the appropriation made for the support of the Army. Now, will the gentleman deny that from Congress to Congress the appropriation being made for the support of the Army is constantly increasing? Do you deny that?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, from the time of the Spanish war to the present the appropriations have been decreasing. They did increase enormously during the Spanish war.

Mr. BURLESON. Does the gentleman mean to say that the military appropriation bill from year to year carries a less amount?

Mr. HULL. A less amount. We increased the Army after the war. During the Spanish war it was an immense increase.

Mr. BURLESON. I am not speaking with reference to the Spanish-American war.

Mr. HULL. Just one minute. You can not keep the expenses of the Army down to a level of Europe when you pay six, eight, or ten times as much to your soldiers as they pay to theirs. If you want to reduce the expense of your Army, you have to cut down the pay of your soldiers.

Mr. BURLESON. Well, is that being done?

Mr. HULL. It ought not to be done.

Mr. BURLESON. Is it being done?

Mr. HULL. No.

Mr. BURLESON. Then you admit that you have not decreased the appropriation.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say just a few words. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] has his annual apprehension about the revenues of the Government and fears we are going to have a deficit. He predicted that a year ago, as he has predicted every year. Now, the fiscal year closes to-day with a surplus of receipts over expenditures of something over $25,000,000. [Applause on the Republican side.] And that is notwithstanding the fact that we have had an extraordinary expense for the Isthmian Canal, for which no bonds have yet been issued, of $25,000,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until 7 o'clock.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Indulge me just a minute, please. I want to make a statement about another matter that has not been discussed here.

Mr. PAYNE. Will not the gentleman wait until after recess? Let us go to dinner.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a minute, and I will confine myself to the minute.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] yield a minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to commend the efforts of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] for his efforts toward economy, and I want to criticise the gentleman who is chairman of the Post-Office Committee—I am glad he is present—because the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] reported a reform measure here on the transportation of notes, bonds, silver coin, securities, and other matters that the Treasury Department has to send by the express companies.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] brought in a reform measure providing that these things should be sent by mail, by which thousands and thousands of dollars would be saved. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] approved the proposition. He said it was a reform that was needed; that this expense was exorbitant. Yet the gentleman from Indiana made the point of order against the reform measure of the gentleman from Minnesota, and he has let five or six months of this Congress go by without bringing in a bill here to cover this proposed reform, so that Congress might pass it as a bill. He contents himself by agreeing that the reform ought to be made; yet he made the point of order against it, and then does not report any bill here to bring about this reform.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I insist on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] moves that the House take a recess until 7 o'clock p. m.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, just one word. I merely wanted to quote the saying of Josh Billings, that "It is better not to know so many things than to know so many things that ain't so." [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is so, and the RECORD will show that I have substantially stated the case.

RECESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], that the House take a recess until 7 o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5.45 p. m.) the House took a recess.

The recess having expired,

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 20511. An act making appropriations for certain public buildings, authorized by the act approved June 30, 1906, and for other purposes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The recess having expired,

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 5119. An act authorizing the extension of W and Adams streets NW.—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 5221. An act to regulate the practice of osteopathy, to license osteopathic physicians, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution for immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 30th day of June, 1906, at 10 o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why is it necessary to remain in session until 10 o'clock? Is not everything about closed up?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I will state to the gentleman that after the business is concluded, and the last bill sent to the President, in accordance with the usual custom a committee will be sent to wait upon the President, who is now at the White House; and to get all that through it seems necessary to fix the hour at 10.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is not the President in the Capitol?

Mr. PAYNE. He has returned to the White House.

Of course this resolution is subject to amendment in the Senate; and if the business is got through with and they see that we can adjourn earlier the resolution can be amended.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. After it is disposed of here the bill has to be signed by the President. Why would it not be the best to wait until everything is through and then adjourn. You may lose a bill or two, or half a dozen bills.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think there is any great danger of that occurring.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What is the use of having any danger of it?

Mr. PAYNE. I think we had better fix the time, so that we can work to that. I think if we had fixed the time for 6 o'clock it could have been worked to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. So far as that is concerned, if we find later on we have fixed the hour too early we can change it.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the House better pass the resolution.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What is the object of that?

Mr. PAYNE. It will give the Senate some definite time to work to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask for a vote on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of three Members be appointed by the Chair to join a similar committee to be appointed by the Senate to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses have completed the business of the present session and are ready to adjourn unless the President has some other communication to make to them.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following committee: Mr. PAYNE, Mr. BURTON of Ohio, and Mr. WILLIAMS.

RECESS.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House take a recess until ten minutes to 9 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection; and accordingly (at 7 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House was declared in recess.

The recess having expired, the House (at 8 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) was called to order.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE (at 8 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until ten minutes past 9 o'clock.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at ten minutes past 9.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 20410. An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until ten minutes of 10.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 9 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House was in recess until ten minutes of 10 o'clock.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following House concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 30th day of June, 1906, at 10 o'clock p. m.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Vice-President to join a similar committee appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses, having completed the business of the present session, are ready to adjourn unless the President has some other communication to make to them.

And that in compliance with the foregoing the Vice-President had appointed as said committee Mr. NELSON and Mr. BLACKBURN.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills and joint resolutions:

H. J. Res. 189. Joint resolution to correct an error in enrollment of, and repealing a certain provision in the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for sundry expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, approved June 30, 1906;

H. J. Res. 188. Joint resolution making an additional appropriation for expenses under the Interstate Commerce Commission;

H. R. 20410. An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 20511. An act making appropriations for certain public buildings authorized by the act approved June 30, 1906, and for other purposes.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House (at 10.50 p. m.) resumed its session.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON PRESIDENT.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the committee appointed by the House to join a similar committee appointed by the Senate to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses of Congress had completed their business, and to ascertain whether he had any further communication to make, report that they have performed that duty, and the President announces that he has no further communication to make.

The SPEAKER. The hour is at hand when under the terms of the concurrent resolution the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress is to close.

I desire to return my thanks to each and all of the membership of the House for the uniform courtesy extended to myself as Speaker.

It is proper for me to say that in thirty years' service in the House of Representatives its membership has never been more able, more industrious, or more devoted to the performance of its duties for the best interests of the country than during the session about to close. The differences at times have been sharp and decisive, but I take pleasure in saying that at all times in our deliberations courtesy has abounded and that our differences have been sincere from the individual and from the party standpoint.

No session of Congress has, in my judgment, for thirty years accomplished so much that is valuable in legislation for the best interests of all the people as has been enacted during the present session. I believe that this will be the verdict of history.

I trust that during the vacation you may remain in health, and return to your duties in December next with renewed strength.

Nothing remains but for me to declare the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress adjourned without day.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Mildred Turley, administratrix of estate of John Turley, against The United States, was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. BARTHOLDT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 5773) to provide a site and buildings for the Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce and Labor, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 5095); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey: A bill (H. R. 20509) to enact the common law in so far as applied to commerce among the States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CLAYTON: A bill (H. R. 20510) to authorize the court of county commissioners of Geneva County, Ala., to construct a bridge across Choctawhatchee River, in Geneva County, about 6 miles above the town of Geneva, Ala.—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. TAWNEY: A bill (H. R. 20511) making appropriations for certain public buildings authorized by the act approved June 30, 1906, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska: A bill (H. R. 20517) to reestablish the weights in which manufactured tobacco and snuff shall be put up in packages for sale—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BISHOP: A bill (H. R. 20518) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to establish and cause to be maintained two free public schools for children under 17 years of age, at the town of Warrington, on the naval reservation on Pensacola Bay, in the State of Florida—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. BURLESON: A concurrent resolution (H. C. Res. 41) directing the Secretary of War to furnish the adjutant-general of the State of Texas a certified copy of the muster rolls of the Texas Rangers, and so forth—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CALDERHEAD: A bill (H. R. 20512) granting an increase of pension to William Massey—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20513) for the relief of John B. Haney—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. GREENE: A bill (H. R. 20514) granting an increase of pension to Fletcher Sullivan—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LAMAR: A bill (H. R. 20515) granting an increase of pension to Robert Gamble—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LLOYD: A bill (H. R. 20516) granting an increase of pension to Henry Mason—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, the following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. GRAHAM: Petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, for investigation into affairs in Kongo Free State—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of D. S. Thomson, Allegheny, Pa., for the Littlefield original-package bill—to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

Also, petition of Association of Manufacturers and Jobbers of Plumbing Supplies, Central Supply Association, Pittsburg Supply Company, and Anchor Sanitary Company, against the eight-hour bill—to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania: Petition of Pittsburg Supply Company and Anchor Sanitary Company, against eight-hour bill—to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. LACEY: Paper to accompany bill for relief of John B. Ackley—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LORIMER: Petition of employees of Miller Hill & Son, of Chicago, for a tax of 25 per cent on all prison-made goods—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Railroad Rate Bill.

SPEECH

OF

HON. JAMES A. HUGHES,

OF WEST VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 7, 1906,

On the bill (H. R. 15650) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof.

Mr. HUGHES said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I gave my hearty support to the Hepburn bill because I regarded it as affording a remedy for an existing evil. It does accomplish this in so far as the question of discrimination between shippers in the matter of rates is concerned. But, in my judgment, the provisions of the bill are not sufficiently specific to properly guard against discrimination between shippers in the matter of furnishing facilities for transportation. There is no difference in principle between the two classes of discrimination. We are not so much concerned in West Virginia over the question of rates as we are over the question of an opportunity of getting our products to the market. It is not of so much importance to us whether the rate is higher or lower, so long as the same rate is given to all. If it is too high the burden falls on the consumer; if too low, on the railroads. But if we are not given adequate facilities for transporting our output, then the burden falls, and very heavily, upon the whole State. Statistics show that the capacity of the West Virginia coal mines now open, developed and ready for operation, is 70,000,000 tons per annum, and that the railroads only furnish cars enough for the transportation of 32,000,000 tons per annum. In other words, we could market more than twice as much coal as we do now if the railroads would furnish the proper transportation facilities. If they were unable to do this that would be another matter, but this is not the case. We now have four great trunk lines crossing the State from east to west. Each of these lines has the highest grade of credit and they could easily arrange to promptly transport our entire product if they would. But they are dealers in coal themselves, and are therefore interested in curtailing the output of independent operating companies. As illustrative of the conditions existing in some portions of that State, I desire to have inserted in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a communication which I have received from the Federal Coal and Coke Company, of Fairmont, W. Va.:

FAIRMONT, W. VA., February 20, 1906.

Hon. JAMES A. HUGHES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As independent miners and shippers of the Fairmont region, of West Virginia, we desire to acknowledge, with very grateful appreciation, the potent thought that has been inspired and is already in motion for the relief of many oppressed shippers.

We confine our remarks to the specific and desperate hardship of the independent miners and shippers of this territory, which, if continued much longer, will tend to make anarchists of many of the best citizens of this fair land. The facts are that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad officials have for a long time held stock in the Fairmont Coal Company, but a few years ago acquired 51 per cent of the stock of that company.

The Fairmont Coal Company is a large combination, operating fifty or sixty coal mines in this district, and, owing to its intimate relations with the railroad officials, the condition of the independent operators has become well-nigh insufferable.

Many of the independent operators have been forced to sell out, and many more are on the ragged edge of a miserable dilemma, hanging on to property so handicapped that it can not be sold.

In reply to complaints and pleadings the Baltimore and Ohio officials take the position that available equipment is equitably distributed on a percentage basis. This percentage is arrived at by their own methods; they rate our capacity by the cars we ship. How can we ship if we do not get cars?

It is a fact, nevertheless, that the Fairmont Coal Company's mines run fairly full always—their annual statements show marvelous profits, while the independent operators, many of them with very eligible up-to-date plants, have during the same years made serious losses, sadly impaired their capital, and contracted ruinous debt.

Take, for example, our own enterprise upon the Paw Paw branch of the Baltimore and Ohio, 8 miles from Fairmont, in the cream of the coal region. The investment, a million and a half dollars, made in all good faith, by most reputable personnel, and with the encouragement years ago of the railroad company, the owners have been made to suffer a loss during the last three years of a half a million dollars. Had this operation been undertaken with what would have seemed a reasonable capital—say, $350,000, and no more behind it—the unfair practices of the railroad officials would have before now totally used us up.

When coal was selling in February, 1902, at $4 per ton, owing to the anthracite railroads' coercive measures, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad authorities only permitted to be put in to the Federal mines for the entire month twenty-two cars (less than one car per day), while the Fairmont Coal Company was shipping more than 400 cars daily.

The Federal property has never been supplied with an average of more than four to six cars daily, making an output of 200 tons per day, though equipped at a cost of nearly a half million dollars for an output of 2,000 tons in ten hours. Cars have been demanded and begged for without avail.

The railroad company by many devices furnish their own coal company with equipment to take care of most of its capacity output—private cars, fuel cars, Monongahela division cars, and miscellaneous cars.

The Fairmont Coal Company's annual reports corroborate the activity of their mines in tonnage and profits.

Railroad charters carry with them so many valuable privileges, as you know, and which their tremendously increasing wealth and power, legitimate and illegitimate, manifest, why should they also be permitted to enter into the producing fields as miners and shippers? No independent operations along the line can meet such competition. For instance, in May, 1904, the Baltimore and Ohio put a rate in force for four days, reduced by 70 cents per ton to a point near Chicago, simply to give the Fairmont Coal Company a clandestine preference to secure a thousand tons per day order on a year's contract from the Wisconsin Central Railroad, and then canceled the rate; but meantime the Fairmont Coal Company had secured the order and shipped for one year for this account about 1,000 tons daily on the rate reduced from $1.90 to $1.20 per ton. This is only one of the many cases equally outrageous and palpably wrong.

Baltimore and Ohio officials high in authority have asked if these "Paw Paw" outfits were not sufficiently ripe to be purchased cheap, and it has been the common talk among local officials for two years that it is a game of "freeze out," and, faith, they will fetch us if there is no rescue.

The point this communication seeks to make is that the railroad carriers should not also be permitted to be producers, traders, and merchants along their lines.

The railway averages to get from independent shippers more than three-fifths of the selling price at destination for freight; the producer less than two-fifths for the coal. Why can they not be satisfied with such division? The stockholders of the road probably would be, but there is an attractive side, a sugar-coated side, to the high officials which can not well be withstood, unless it can be corrected by some power greater than the railway officials.

If the railroads and officers of the railroads could be made to keep their hands off, neither directly nor indirectly allowed any share in private enterprises along their lines, that would be a great relief and assurance to business people generally along all lines of railroads throughout the country.

It is the most momentous subject Congress can have to deal with if the freedom of the people and legitimate opportunity for our sons is to be continued in this country.

Transportation touches every man, woman, and child in the land. By railroad squeeze and favor some have already been enslaved, some abnormally enriched, and all affected.

Since writing the above Second Vice-President Bond, of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, in reply to the Red Rock Fuel Company, stated to the Senate, through Mr. RAYNER, that for many years the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad had owned the controlling interest in the Consolidation Coal Company; and he further added that through the Consolidation Coal Company the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad had acquired, in 1903, a bare majority of the stock of the Fairmont Coal Company.

What more could Mr. Bond have said to conclusively show the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to be both carriers and producers, which the Supreme Court decision rendered by Justice White on the 19th declared should not be permitted.

The most dangerous avenue through which autocratic power arises is through railroad magnates' manipulations. Adjust this power effectually, and the obnoxious and unfair influences of combinations would be so minimized as to be tolerable.

Yours, very respectfully,

FEDERAL COAL AND COKE CO.
J. L. LEWIS, Secretary.

This is only one of a number of complaints of the same general character that have reached me, and which show that independent miners and shippers are seriously embarrassed and subjected to great loss as a result of the manner in which these trunk lines are now conducting their business. They refuse to furnish the number of cars needed. They refuse to put in switches or allow connections with their lines, notwithstanding the fact that there are people interested in the development of the State's resources who are willing to build branch and lateral lines for that purpose.

I do not wish to be understood as desiring to antagonize these railroads. They have developed the resources of West Virginia and have done more than any other agency toward placing the State in its present prosperous condition. But the Government has granted these corporations valuable franchises and it affords them ample protection for all of their property interests. Moreover, they are engaged in the operation of a public utility. They therefore owe in return a duty to the Government—the whole people—which is violated whenever they give to one shipper privileges that they deny to another. All that I contend for is that they should be required to give all shippers equal opportunities for reaching the market with their products. I would have offered an amendment to the Hepburn bill covering these points when it was pending in the House, but that was a compromise measure. It had been agreed upon by both the majority and the minority of the committee, and it was generally understood that no amendments to it would be adopted and I did not deem it wise to offer the amendment when it was confronted with the certainty of defeat. I preferred to bring it to the attention of the House in the shape of a separate bill, which I have done. This bill has been framed along the lines of the amendments which were so earnestly urged, but without success, by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] when the Hepburn bill was under consideration by the Senate committee. It requires nothing of these railroads that they are not amply able to do, and nothing but what in justice to the shippers they ought to do. Moreover, it provides that they shall have reasonable notice of these requirements. Unless some such legislation as this is enacted the State of West Virginia will receive very little, if any, substantial benefit as a result of all of this talk and legislating upon the rate question.

Although my bill does not go into the question, I am very decidedly of the opinion that railroads ought not to be permitted to engage in any business other than transportation of freight and passengers, and especially that they ought not to be permitted to sell coal in competition with miners and shippers. In other words, they ought not to be both carriers and producers. So long as they are there will continue to be more or less trouble over this question, and there will be those who will accuse them of discrimination in the matter of affording facilities for transportation, however impartial they may be. The Supreme Court of the United States only a few days ago delivered an opinion bearing upon this question which will be of great interest to the people of West Virginia, and I therefore ask that it be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The opinion referred to is as follows:

[Supreme Court of the United States. Nos. 24 and 27.—October term, 1905. New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company, appellant, v. The Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission, appellant, v. The Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company and the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company. Appeals from the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Virginia. February 19, 1906.]

Mr. Justice White delivered the opinion of the court.

Following an inquiry, begun in consequence of a complaint to it made, the Interstate Commerce Commission, through the Attorney-General of the United States, filed under the act to further regulate commerce (32 Stat., 847) in the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Virginia, this proceeding against the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company, a Virginia corporation, and the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company, a corporation of the State of Connecticut. In this opinion we shall hereafter respectively speak of the parties as the Commission, the Chesapeake and Ohio, and the New Haven. The petition averred that the Chesapeake and Ohio was engaged in the carriage of coal as interstate traffic between the Kanawha district of West Virginia and Newport News, Va., for delivery thence to the New Haven, in Connecticut, and charged that the traffic was being moved at less than the published rates, and in such a way as to produce a discrimination in favor of the New Haven road and against others, all in violation of the act to regulate commerce and the amendments thereto. Specifying the grounds of the complaint, it was alleged that in the spring of 1893 the Chesapeake and Ohio made a verbal agreement with the New Haven to sell to that road 60,000 tons of coal, to be carried from the Kanawha district to Newport News, and thence by water to Connecticut, for delivery to the buyer at $2.75 per ton, and that a considerable portion had already been delivered and the remainder was in process of delivery. It was averred that the price of the coal at the mines where the Chesapeake and Ohio bought it and the cost of transportation from Newport News to Connecticut would aggregate $2.47 per ton, thus leaving to the Chesapeake and Ohio only about 28 cents a ton for carrying the coal from the Kanawha district to Newport News, whilst the published tariff for like carriage from the same district was $1.45 per ton.

Referring to the developments before the Commission, and annexing as part the testimony taken on such hearing and the documents connected therewith, the petition further alleged that the Chesapeake and Ohio asserted that, although the total price which it received for the coal covered by the verbal agreement was less than the total outlay in delivering the coal, including its published rates, such fact did not amount to a departure from the published rates and was not a discrimination, for two reasons: First, because if such difference existed, it was a loss suffered by the Chesapeake and Ohio not from taking less than its published rates, but because it had received less as purchaser than the coal had cost; second, that even if it had not the lawful right thus to impute the payment of the price of the coal, the Chesapeake and Ohio had, in fact, received much more for the coal than the price in money agreed on, because at the time the verbal agreement to sell was made the New Haven had a claim exceeding $100,000 against the Chesapeake and Ohio arising from a previous written contract to deliver coal, which was to be extinguished by the completion of the delivery of the coal, and this caused that price largely to exceed the cost of the coal to the Chesapeake and Ohio, including its published rates. Averring that the prior contract was in itself void because it also embodied an agreement to take less than the published rates and was discriminating, it was charged that the New Haven had entered into both agreements with the Chesapeake and Ohio knowing that they were in violation of the interstate-commerce law. The prayer was that the Chesapeake and Ohio and the New Haven be made parties; that both roads be enjoined, the one from further executing the verbal agreement to deliver coal and the other from seeking to enforce it; that the Chesapeake and Ohio be enjoined from "accepting or receiving any rebate, concession, or discrimination in respect of the transportation of any property in interstate or foreign commerce carried by it" and be, moreover, enjoined from "doing anything whatever whereby coal or any other property shall, by any device whatever, be transported * * * at a less rate than named in the tariffs published and filed by such carrier, as is required by the act to regulate commerce, and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, or whereby any other advantage may be given or discrimination practiced," and that the New Haven road "be enjoined and restrained from accepting or receiving any rebate, concession, or discrimination in respect of the transportation of any property in interstate or foreign commerce carried by it."

A preliminary restraining order was issued conforming to the prayer of the petition. The Chesapeake and Ohio by its answer admitted that it had made, in the spring of 1903, a verbal agreement with the New Haven road for about 60,000 tons of Kanawha coal for the price alleged in the petition, to be transported by it to Newport News; and thence delivered by ocean transportation to the New Haven in Connecticut. It was admitted that the purchase price agreed to be paid was less than the market price of the coal plus the published rates and the cost of transportation and delivery from Newport News to Connecticut, but it was averred that this was only apparently the case, because the contract to sell included the discharge of a debt of about $100,000, arising from the previous written contract to which the petition referred. The validity of both the previous written contract and the later verbal agreement was averred. The right of the Chesapeake and Ohio to buy and sell coal, and to impute any loss on the sale of the coal to itself as dealer instead of to itself as a carrier, was averred. Both the original contract and the one of 1903 were averred to have been made in good faith, not with any intention to avoid the published rates, and it was charged that at about the time the original contract was made arrangements had been made by the railroad for a rate of transportation from Newport News to Connecticut which would have caused the contract price to be adequate to pay the market price of the coal and all other charges, including the published rates, but that, subsequently thereto, the persons with whom this contract for transportation was made had violated their agreement, and that by strikes the price of coal had advanced, and thereby the loss of $100,000 to the Chesapeake and Ohio was occasioned.

The New Haven road in its answer asserted its good faith in making both the original contract and the verbal agreement. It alleged that by the original contract it was a mere purchaser of coal from the Chesapeake and Ohio, and not a shipper over that road; that the coal bought was intended for its own use in the operation of its railroad; that it had no knowledge of the price which the Chesapeake and Ohio would be obliged to pay for the coal or the sum which it would cost that road to deliver it, and therefore had no knowledge that the total cost would not equal the market price of the coal, the cost of delivery, and the published rate of the Chesapeake and Ohio. It averred the validity of the agreement, the legality of the debt of $100,000 which resulted from it, and charged that, taking that debt into consideration, the sum which it paid the Chesapeake and Ohio for the coal under the 1903 verbal agreement largely exceeded the market price and the cost of delivery, including the published rates of the Chesapeake and Ohio. It denied that there was any departure from the public rates or any discrimination, asserted that at the time the original contract was made the price was sufficient to have enabled the Chesapeake and Ohio to perform the contract without losing anything either as a seller or as a carrier, and that if in execution of the contract a condition arose where a loss was suffered by the Chesapeake and Ohio in either capacity it was caused by subsequent events which could not affect the validity of the contract when made, and especially denied that in any way, directly or indirectly, had it knowingly lent itself to any discrimination, or any taking by the Chesapeake and Ohio of less than its published rates.

The case was heard on the testimony taken in the proceeding before the Commission and the documents forming a part of the same and upon further documents and testimony stipulated by counsel.

For reasons to which we shall hereafter have occasion to advert, the court held that, considering both the original contract and the verbal agreement of 1903, there was no violation of the provisions of the second and sixth sections of the act to regulate commerce, forbidding the taking of less than the published rates. It, however, held that the contracts amounted to an undue discrimination and a violation of the third section of the act. The court hence permanently enjoined the Chesapeake and Ohio from discharging any obligation arising from the original contract of 1896 and from further executing or attempting to execute, in any manner whatever, directly or indirectly, the verbal agreement of 1903, and it permanently enjoined the New Haven from asserting or attempting to enforce any claim arising from the contract of 1896, or in any manner, directly or indirectly, attempting to enforce the verbal agreement of 1903. Thereafter the court denied a request made by the Commission, that the injunction be expanded so as in general terms to command the Chesapeake and Ohio perpetually to observe in the future its published rates.

The Chesapeake and Ohio and the New Haven appealed. The Commission also prosecuted a cross appeal because of the refusal of the court to grant its prayer to make the injunction against the Chesapeake and Ohio general in its nature.

It is apparent from the case as thus stated that, in order to decide the issues which arise, we may not confine our attention to the verbal agreement of 1903, the execution of which it was the immediate object of the proceeding to enjoin, but must consider the prior contract of 1896, since primarily the rights, if any, which arose under the verbal agreement are inextricably involved in and dependent upon the contract of 1896. In other words, the controversy as considered by the Commission on the inquiry by it conducted and as decided below, and as here presented, involves an analysis of all the dealings under both contracts and the legal rights, if any, which arose from them. We must, therefore, consider the subject in this aspect, and to do so we state at once the facts which are admitted or which are indisputably established, reserving such questions of fact as are in dispute for separate consideration when we approach the legal propositions which arise from the undisputed facts.

The Chesapeake and Ohio, chartered by the State of Virginia, operates a road which reaches both the New River and the Kanawha coal fields of West Virginia, and extends to Newport News. The New Haven, chartered by the State of Connecticut, operates a road principally situated in New England. On December 3, 1896, these two roads entered into a written contract, the one to sell and the other to buy between July 1, 1897, and July 1, 1902, not to exceed 2,000,000 gross tons of bituminous coal to be taken from the line of the Chesapeake and Ohio road, deliveries to be made not exceeding 400,000 tons per annum. The price agreed upon was $2.75 per gross ton, New Haven basis, settlement to be made monthly. The coal was to be delivered by the seller on the line of the New Haven. The contract is reproduced, as follows:

Contract made between the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company and the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company.

Said Cheasapeake and Ohio Railway Company, for the consideration hereinafter mentioned, hereby agrees to furnish to said railroad company not to exceed 2,000,000 gross tons of bituminous coal from its line in such quantities monthly as wanted from July 1, 1897, to July 1, 1902, without charge for demurrage. Deliveries to be made not exceeding 400,000 tons per annum.

And said Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company further agrees that all said bituminous coal shall be of the best quality, first class in every respect, and satisfactory to said railroad company, and said railway company has the right to terminate this contract at any time if said bituminous coal be of poor quality or if its delivery be unnecessarily delayed.

And said Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company further agrees to deliver all said bituminous coal to said railroad company in its bins at such ports upon its lines as required by the monthly requisitions of its purchasing agent.

In consideration of the faithful performance by the said Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company of all its agreements herein contained said railroad company agrees to pay for said bituminous coal at the rate of two and seventy-five one-hundredths dollars per gross ton, New Haven basis, settlement to be made monthly.

Said railway company has the right to cancel any and all portions of said quantity of bituminous coal remaining undelivered on July 1, 1902.

Witness the names of the parties hereto this the 3d day of December, 1896.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO RAILWAY COMPANY,
By M. E. INGALLS, President.
THE NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN AND HARTFORD RAILROAD COMPANY,
By C. E. MELLEN, Second Vice-President.

For value received, I hereby guarantee that the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company shall not fail to deliver coal on account of strikes.

J. PIERPONT MORGAN.

The Chesapeake and Ohio, not in its own name, but through others who really, although not ostensibly, acted for it, made a contract with operators in the New River district of West Virginia for the delivery to it of the coal to fulfill the contract which had been made with the New Haven. In consequence of failure of some of the operators to perform their part of the contract, changes were made at various times, which it is unnecessary to note. Deliveries of the coal were made to the New Haven as required up to the winter of 1900–1901, when, because of strikes and other difficulties, delivery ceased and the New Haven bought coal in the open market and presented to the Chesapeake and Ohio a bill for the increased price which it had paid, and the Chesapeake and Ohio paid $160,000 to cover such loss. Subsequently, in 1902, further strikes supervened and deliveries again ceased, at a time when about 60,000 tons remained yet to be delivered. The New Haven again presented a bill for damages amounting to $103,000. Thereupon the verbal agreement of 1903 was made, by which it was provided that the shortage of 60,000 tons upon the original contract might be discharged by delivery on the part of the Chesapeake and Ohio of that amount of coal from the Kanawha district at the contract price of $2.75, and when this delivery was consummated it was agreed that the Chesapeake and Ohio would be absolutely relieved from the payment of the damage claim just referred to.

At the time this verbal agreement was made the contract price was, leaving out of view the claim for damages, inadequate to pay the market price, as admitted by the pleadings, of the coal plus the published rates of the Chesapeake and Ohio to Newport News, and the charges thence to the point of delivery. To put itself in a position to carry out the agreement an individual who represented the Chesapeake and Ohio made contracts in his own name with operators in the Kanawha district to furnish the desired coal. Without stopping to state the particular methods of accounting by which the result was accomplished, it is indisputable that the Chesapeake and Ohio bore the loss arising from the difference between the contract price, the price of the coal at the mines, the published rate to Newport News, and the cost of transporting thence to the point of delivery.

Undoubtedly long prior to the making of the first contract the Chesapeake and Ohio, besides its business as a carrier, bought and sold coal. This business was carried on by the company from about 1874 up to the time of the making of the contract of 1896, as testified by the president who made that contract, as follows:

"The coal was handled by a separate and distinct department of the railway company, the mine operators delivering for an agreed price at the mines to the coal agent of the railway company all coal mined by them, the net result realized from the selling price of the coal representing the freight earned by the railway company."

And the same official testified that he made the contract of 1896 as a continuation of this system.

In 1895, however, the State of West Virginia passed "An act to prevent railroad companies from buying or selling coal or coke and to prevent discrimination." The first section of this act made it unlawful for any railroad corporation to engage directly or indirectly in the business of buying and selling coal or coke. In consequence of this act, prior to the making of the contract of 1896, the coal department of the railroad was abolished. And it was the existence of the West Virginia statute which caused the Chesapeake and Ohio, when it contracted with operators in West Virginia to procure as to both contracts the coal for delivery to the New Haven, to do so not in its own name but through another.

Before applying to these undisputed facts the legal question arising for decision, we must determine a question of fact as to which there is some dispute; that is, Was the price at which the Chesapeake and Ohio contracted in 1896 to sell the coal to the New Haven sufficient to pay the cost of the coal at mines, as well as the expense of delivery, including the published freight rate? Without stopping to go into the evidence, we content ourselves with saying that we think the court below correctly held that the price was not adequate to accomplish these purposes, and that from the inception of delivery under the contract and during the whole period thereof, except for a brief time, caused by a lowering of the freight rates, the contract price was inadequate to net the railroad its proper legal tariff.

We are brought then to determine whether the contract made in 1896 for the 2,000,000 tons of coal was void because in conflict with the act to regulate commerce and its amendments. In approaching the consideration of the act to regulate commerce we, for the moment, put out of view the provisions of the West Virginia statute and its influence upon the validity of the contract made in West Virginia for the purpose of acquiring the coal which the Chesapeake and Ohio had obligated itself to deliver. We shall also assume, for the purpose of the inquiry, that the Chesapeake and Ohio, although not expressly authorized, was not prohibited by its Virginia charter from buying and selling and transporting the coal in which it dealt. The case, therefore, will be considered solely in the light of the operation and effect of the provisions of the act to regulate commerce, and we shall not direct our attention to expressly determining whether the assertion by a carrier of a right to deal in the products which it transports would not be so repugnant to the general duty resting on the carrier as to cause the exertion of the power to deal in the products which it transports to be unlawful, irrespective of statutory restrictions.

The question, therefore, to be decided is this: Has a carrier engaged in interstate commerce the power to contract to sell and transport in completion of the contract the commodity sold when the price stipulated in the contract does not pay the cost of purchase, the cost of delivery, and the published freight rates?

The previous decisions of this court concerning the interstate-commerce act do not afford much aid in determining this question. This is the case because, although that act was adopted in 1887, and questions concerning the import of the act have been often here, such questions have not generally involved the operation and effect of the act concerning the command that published rates be adhered to, and the prohibitions against discrimination, favoritism, or rebates, but have mainly concerned the meaning of the act in other respects; that is, involved deciding whether powers asserted as to other subjects were vested by the act in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

There are several leading cases decided by the Commission, which are relied upon by the two railroads, directly relating to the question we have stated, but, as we shall have occasion hereafter to weigh their import, we shall not now pause to analyze and apply them.

It can not be challenged that the great purpose of the act to regulate commerce, whilst seeking to prevent unjust and unreasonable rates, was to secure equality of rates as to all and to destroy favoritism, these last being accomplished by requiring the publication of tariffs and by prohibiting secret departures from such tariffs, and forbidding rebates, preferences, and all other forms of undue discrimination. To this extent and for these purposes the statute was remedial and is, therefore, entitled to receive that interpretation which reasonably accomplishes the great public purpose which it was enacted to subserve. That a carrier engaged in interstate commerce becomes subject as to such commerce to the commands of the statute, and may not set its provisions at naught whatever otherwise may be its power when carrying on commerce not interstate in character, can not in reason be denied. Now, in view of the positive command of the second section of the act, that no departure from the published rate shall be made, "directly or indirectly," how can it in reason be held that a carrier may take itself from out the statute in every case by simply electing to be a dealer and transport a commodity in that character? For, of course, if a carrier has a right to disregard the published rates by resorting to a particular form of dealing, it must follow that there is no obligation on the part of a carrier to adhere to the rates, because doing so is merely voluntary.

The all-embracing prohibition against either directly or indirectly charging less than the published rates shows that the purpose of the statute was to make the prohibition applicable to every method of dealing by a carrier by which the forbidden result could be brought about. If the public purpose which the statute was intended to accomplish be borne in mind, its meaning becomes, if possible, clearer. What was that purpose? It was to compel the carrier as a public agent to give equal treatment to all. Now, if by the mere fact of purchasing and selling merchandise to be transported a carrier is endowed with the power of disregarding the published rate, it becomes apparent that the carrier possesses the right to treat the owners of like commodities by entirely different rules. That is to say, the existence of such a power in its essence would enable a carrier, if it chose to do so, to select the favored persons from whom he would buy and the favored persons to whom he would sell, thus giving such persons an advantage over every other, and leading to a monopolization in the hands of such persons of all the products as to which the carrier chose to deal. Indeed, the inevitable result of the possession of such a right by a carrier would be to enable it, if it chose to exercise the power, to concentrate in its own hands the products which were held for shipment along its line, and to make it, therefore, the sole purchaser thereof and the sole seller at the place where the products were to be marketed; in other words, to create an absolute monopoly. To illustrate: If a carrier may by becoming a dealer buy property for transportation to a market and eliminate the cost of transportation to such market, a faculty possessed by no other owner of the commodity, it must result that the carrier would be in a position where no other person could ship the commodity on equal terms with the carrier in its capacity of dealer. No other person owning the commodity being thus able to ship on equal terms, it would result that the owners of such commodity would not be able to ship, but would be compelled to sell to the carrier. And as by the departure from the traiff rates the person to whom the carrier might elect to sell would be able to buy at a price less than any other person could sell for, it would follow that such person so selected by the carrier would have a monopoly in the market to which the goods were transported. And that the result arising from an admission of the asserted power of the carrier as a dealer to disregard the published rates conduces immediately and not merely remotely to the production of the injurious results stated is not only demonstrated by the very nature of things, but is established to be the case by the facts indisputably shown on this record. For here it is unquestioned that the Chesapeake and Ohio, as a result of its being a dealer, had become, long prior to the adoption of the interstate-commerce law, and continued to be thereafter, up to the passage of the West Virginia statute prohibiting a carrier from dealing in coal, virtually the sole purchaser and seller of all the coal produced along the line of its road.

That the result was not merely accidental, but was in effect engendered by the power of the carrier to deal and transport a commodity, is illustrated by the case of the Attorney-General v. The Great Northern Railway Company (29 Law Journal [N. S. Equity], 794). In that case Vice-Chancellor Kindersley was called upon to determine whether dealing in coal by the railway company was illegal, because incompatible with its duties as a public carrier and calculated to inflict an injury upon the public. In deciding that the act of Parliament granting the charter to operate the railway implied a prohibition against the company's engaging in any other business the reason for the rule was thus expressed (p. 798):

"* * * These large companies, joint stock companies generally, for whatever purpose established, and more particularly railway companies, are armed with powers of raising and possessing large sums of money—large amounts of property—and if they were to apply that money, or that property, to purposes other than those for which they were constituted, they might very much injure the interests of the public in various ways."

Illustrating the danger to the public, as established by the case before him, the vice-chancellor said (p. 792):

"Here we find this company, having the traffic from the north of England, where the great coal fields are (at least some of the principal coal fields), supplying the country with coal, or capable of supplying it; this company buys the coal, which gives to the company an interest in checking, as much as possible, those who will not deal with them; and it is quite clear that it is possible, by the mode in which this company may, I will not say has, but by the mode in which this company may exercise such powers as either it has or assumes to have, this company may get into their hands the traffic—that is, the dealing in all the coal in the large districts supplying coal to the country. They have to a considerable extent done so, and there is no reason why it should not go on progressing. I observe that in the eight (?) years from 1852 to 1857, inclusive, the amount of their coal business has increased from 73,000 tons to 794,000 tons; and there is no reason, as the affidavits show, why they should not—there is great danger that they may—get into their hands the entire business in the coal of all that district of the country. If they can do so with regard to coal what is to prevent their doing it with every species of agricultural produce all along the line? Why should they not become purchasers of corn, of all kinds of beasts, and of sheep, and every species of agricultural produce, and become great dealers in the supply of edibles to the markets of London; and why not every other species of commodity that is produced in every part of the country from which or to which their railway runs? I do not know where it is to stop, if the argument on the part of the company is to prevail. There is, therefore, great detriment to the interests of the public, for this reason, taking merely the article of coal."

It is apparent that the construction of the statute which is now claimed by the carriers would, if adopted, not only destroy its entire remedial efficacy, but would cause the provisions of the statute to accentuate and multiply the very wrongs which it was enacted to prevent.

Without a statutory requirement as to publication of rates and the imposition of a duty to adhere to the rates as published, individual action of the shippers as between themselves and in their dealings with the carrier would have full play, and thereby every shipper would have the opportunity to procure such concessions as might result from favoritism or other causes. Interpreting the prohibitions of the statute as it is contended they should be, it would follow that every individual would be bound by the published tariff, and the carrier alone would be free to disregard it. Thus the statute, while subjecting the public to the prohibitions, would exempt the carrier and would thereby enormously increase the opportunities of the latter to do the wrongs which the statute was enacted to prevent.

And the considerations previously stated serve also to demonstrate that the prohibitions of the act to regulate commerce concerning "undue or unreasonable preference or advantage," "undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage," and "unjust discrimination" are in conflict with the asserted right of a carrier to become a dealer in commodities which it transports, and as such dealer to sell at a price less than the cost and the published rates. Certain also is it, when the reasons previously stated are applied to those prohibitions of the statute, the possession of the power by a carrier to deal in merchandise and to sell and transport at less than prohibited rates would not only destroy the remedy intended to be afforded by the provisions in question, but would cause the statute to fructify the growth of the wrongs which it was intended to extirpate. In a general sense the considerations which we have previously stated, moreover, dispose of all the contentions urged at bar to establish the right of the carrier to become a dealer under the circumstances stated. Even although it may give rise to some repetition, we more particularly notice the various contentions.

(a) It is said that when a carrier sells an article which it has purchased and transports that article for delivery it is both a dealer and a carrier. When, therefore, the price received for the commodity is adequate to pay the published freight rate and something over, the command of the statute as to adherence to the published rates is complied with, because the price will be imputed to the freight rate, and the loss, if any, attributed to the company in its capacity as dealer and not as a carrier. This simply asserts the proposition which we have disposed of—that a carrier possesses the power, by the form in which he deals, to render the prohibitions of the act ineffective, since it implies the right of a carrier to shut off inquiry as to the real result of a particular transaction on the published rates, and thereby to obtain the power of disregarding the prohibitions of the statute.

(b) It is said that, as in the case in hand, it is shown that there was no intention on the part of the carrier in making the sale of the coal to violate the prohibitions of the statute, and, on the contrary, as the proof shows an arrangement made by the carrier for transporting the coal from Newport News to Connecticut, which, if it had been carried out, would have provided for the full published rate, therefore an honest contract made by the carrier should not be stricken down because of things over which the carrier had no control. The proposition involves both an unfounded assumption of fact and an unwarranted implication of law. It is true the court below found that the proof did not justify the inference that the Chesapeake and Ohio had, in 1896, made the contract to sell the coal to the New Haven with the purpose of avoiding a compliance with the published rates. But in this conclusion of fact we can not agree. Whilst it may be that the proof establishes that the contract for the sale of coal was not made as a mere device for avoiding the operation of the statute, we think the proof leaves no doubt that, in making the contract in question, the Chesapeake and Ohio was wholly indifferent to and did not concern itself with the prohibitions of the statute, of which, of course, it must be assumed to have had full knowledge. As we have seen, the president of the Chesapeake and Ohio, by whom the corporation was represented in making the contract, expressly testified that from the beginning that corporation had pursued the policy of acquiring all the coal mined on its line and sold it, relying upon the net result of such sales for its freight compensation, and that the particular contract was made in continuation of that policy. We find it impossible to conclude, from the proof, that the Chesapeake and Ohio could have made a contract for so large an amount of coal, to be delivered over so long a period, without taking into view the existing prices and the cost necessarily to be occasioned by the delivery of the coal, if the full published freight rates were to be realized. Indeed, the proof leaves no doubt upon our minds that, in making the contract, the Chesapeake and Ohio sought to accomplish results which it deemed beneficial by means which it considered effectual, even although resort to such means was prohibited by the interstate-commerce act.

In other words, we think it is established beyond doubt that, desiring to stimulate the production of coal along its line and thereby, as it conceived, to increase the carriage of that commodity and to benefit the railroad and those living along its line by the reflex prosperity which it was deemed would arise from giving a stimulus to an industry tributary to the railroad, the Chesapeake and Ohio bought and sold the coal without reference to whether the net result to it would realize its published rates. And it would seem that this means of stimulating the industry in question was resorted to instead of attempting to bring about the same result by a lowering of the published rates, because to have so done would have engendered disparity between coal rates and the tariff on all the other articles contained in the same classification, and would besides have caused other and competing roads to make a similar reduction on the published rates, and thereby would have frustrated the very advantage to itself and those along its lines which the Chesapeake and Ohio deemed it was bringing about by the method pursued. That is to say, we think it is shown that the mode of dealing adopted was simply the result of a disregard by the Chesapeake and Ohio of the economic conceptions upon which the interstate-commerce law rests and a substitution in their stead of the conceptions of the Chesapeake and Ohio as to what was best for itself and for the public. Further, as the prohibition of the interstate-commerce act is ever operative, even if the facts established that at the particular time the contract was made, considering the then cost of coal and other proper items, the net published tariff of rates would have been realized by the Chesapeake and Ohio from the contract, which is not the case, it is apparent that the deliveries under the contract came under the prohibition of the statute whenever for any cause, such as the enhanced cost of the coal at the mines, an increase in the cost of the ocean carriage, etc., the gross sum realized was not sufficient to net the Chesapeake and Ohio its published tariff of rates. This must be the case in order to give vitality to the prohibitions of the interstate-commerce act against the acceptance at any time by a carrier of less than its published rates. We say this because we think it is obvious that such prohibitions would be rendered wholly ineffective by deciding that a carrier may avoid those prohibitions by making a contract for the sale of a commodity stipulating for the payment of a fixed price in the future, and thereby acquiring the power during the life of the contract to continue to execute it, although a violation of the act to regulate commerce might arise from doing so. Besides, all the contentions just noticed proceed upon the mistaken legal conception that the application of the statutory prohibitions depend not upon whether the effect of the acts done is to violate those prohibitions, but upon whether the carrier intended to violate the statute.

(c) It is urged that if the requirement of the act to regulate commerce as to the maintenance of published rates and the prohibitions of that act against undue preferences and discriminations be applied to a carrier when engaged in buying and selling a commodity which it transports, the substantial effect will be to prohibit the carrier from becoming a dealer when no such prohibition is expressed in the act to regulate commerce, and hence a prohibition will be implied which should only result from express act by Congress. Granting the premise, the deduction is unfounded. Because no express prohibition against a carrier who engages in interstate commerce becoming a dealer in commodities moving in such commerce is found in the act, it does not follow that the provisions which are expressed in that act should not be applied and be given their lawful effect. Even, therefore, if the result of applying the prohibitions as we have interpreted them will be practically to render it difficult, if not impossible, for a carrier to deal in commodities, this affords no ground for relieving us of the plain duty of enforcing the provisions of the statute as they exist. This conclusion follows, since the power of Congress to subject every carrier engaging in interstate commerce to the regulations which it has adopted is undoubted.

But it is, in effect, said, conceding this to be true as an original question, the prohibitions of the act ought not now to be interpreted as applying to a carrier who is a dealer in commodities, because of an administrative construction long since given to the act by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the body primarily charged with its enforcement, and which has become a rule of property affecting vast interests which should not be judicially departed from, especially as such construction, it is asserted, has been impliedly sanctioned by Congress by frequently amending the act without changing it in this particular.

Passing for the present the legal conclusion, let us first ascertain whether the premise itself is well founded. The two rulings of the Interstate Commerce Commission upon which the premise is based are Haddock v. Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company (4 I. C. C. Rep., 296; 3 Inters. Com. Rep., 302) and Coxe Brothers & Co. v. Lehigh Valley Railroad Company (4 I. C. C. Rep., 535; 3 Inters. Com. Rep., 460), decided, respectively, in 1890 and 1891.

Without going into detail, we content ourselves with saying that in both of the cases complaints were made to the Interstate Commerce Commission concerning the defendant railroads, and it was charged that whilst acting as common carriers they were dealing in coal, and as a result violating the prohibition of the interstate-commerce act as to rates and undue preferences and discriminations. It was shown in both cases that the carriers prior to the adoption of the interstate-commerce act were authorized by their charters or legislative authority to carry on both the business of mining and selling the coal so mined and transporting the same to market. Indeed, it was found in both cases that the functions of producing and transporting as authorized were so interblended that it was impossible to separate one from the other. Whilst it is true that in both of the cases it was also shown that the carriers bought, sold, and transported some coal which was not produced in the mines which they owned, this fact was evidently treated, in view of the other circumstances of the case, as of minor importance, since the commingled powers of producing, selling, and transporting were alone made the basis of the conclusion reached by the Commission as to the character of relief which could be afforded. Solely in view of the lawful power of the carriers to mine, sell, and transport existing before the passage of the act to regulate commerce, the Commission decided that its authority, under that statute and under the circumstances of the case, was confined to compelling the exaction of rates which were just and reasonable. The fact that the rulings in the two cases just referred to were solely placed upon the peculiar powers of the defendant corporations possessed by them prior to the passage of the interstate-commerce act was pointed out by the Commission in Grain Rates of Chicago Great Western Rwy. Co. (7 I. C. C. Rep., 33). In that case, in deciding that the defendant carrier was without power to purchase grain for the purpose of securing the right to transport it, and thus evade the law which would have applied to its transportation had it been owned by any other party, the Commission, in distinguishing the case before it from the Haddock and Coxe cases, said (p. 38):

"Those cases are in no respect similar to this. In both the common carrier was also the owner of extensive coal fields, and, indeed, it had become a common carrier largely for the purpose of transporting the product of those mines to market. This state of things existed before the passage of the act, and had no reference to the act. Unless the carrier was permitted to transport its coal, the result would be, in effect, the confiscation of its property, and to order it to charge itself with a particular rate would merely result in a matter of bookkeeping. Under these circumstances it was held that the only remedy was to inquire whether the rate charged the complainant was a reasonable one."

Now, without at all intimating that as an original question we would concur in the view expressed in the case last cited, that to have applied the act to regulate commerce, under proper rules and regulations for the segregation of the business of producing, selling, and transporting, as presented in the Haddock and Coxe cases, would have been confiscatory, and without reviewing the rulings made by the Interstate Commerce Commission in those cases and adhered to by that body during the many years which have followed those decisions, we concede that the interpretation given by the Commission in those cases to the act to regulate commerce is now binding, and as restricted to the precise conditions which were passed on in the cases referred to, must be applied to all strictly identical cases in the future, at least until Congress has legislated on the subject. We make this concession because we think we are constrained to so do, in consequence of the familiar rule that a construction made by the body charged with the enforcement of a statute, which construction has long obtained in practical execution, and has been impliedly sanctioned by the reenactment of the statute without alteration in the particulars construed, when not plainly erroneous, must be treated as read into the statute. Especially do we think this rule applicable to the case in hand, because of the nature and extent of the authority conferred on the Commission from the beginning concerning the prohibitions of the act as to rebates, favoritism, and discrimination of all kinds, and particularly in view of the repeated declarations of the court that an exertion of power by the Commission concerning such matters was entitled to great weight and was not lightly to be interfered with. The concessions thus made, however, are wholly irrelevant to the case before us. This follows, since the Chesapeake and Ohio was neither by its charter nor by legislative grant existing at the time of the adoption of the act to regulate commerce, possessed of the commingled attributes of carrier and producer, which was the controlling consideration in the decisions made in the Haddock and Coxe cases.

Concluding, therefore, that both the contracts made by the Chesapeake and Ohio with the New Haven were contrary to public policy and void because in conflict with the prohibitions of the act to regulate commerce, it obviously follows that such contracts were not susceptible of being enforced by the New Haven, and afforded no legal basis for a claim of the New Haven against the Chesapeake and Ohio, and therefore the court below was correct in so deciding.

This leaves only for consideration the question raised by the cross appeal of the Interstate Commerce Commission. That proposition is thus stated in the first of the assignments of error filed on behalf of the Commission:

"That the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Virginia, after finding that the claim of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company against the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company for $103,910.69, asserted as damages arising from a partial nonperformance by said railway company of a contract of December 3, 1896, set out in the record, is, as to the whole of said claim and interest thereon, an illegal and unenforceable claim, and after finding that the verbal agreement between said companies, made in April, 1903, and set out in said record, whereby said railway company undertook to furnish to said railroad company 59,966 tons of coal, to be transported from West Virginia to Newport News, Va., over the lines of said railway company, and thence transported by vessels to certain New England ports, said coal to be delivered at said ports at the price of $2.75 per ton, New Haven basis, to be an invalid and illegal agreement; that said court merely enjoined and restrained the said Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company, its officers, agents, and employees, from in any manner, direct or indirect, executing or performing, or attempting to execute or perform, either said contract of December 3, 1896, or said agreement of April, 1903, and from in any manner discharging or satisfying any obligation or seeming obligation arising from said agreements or either of them, or arising from any arrangement or agreement made in lieu of said agreements, or either of them; whereas said court should have further enjoined and restrained the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company from giving to said railroad company, or to any other person, firm, or company, any undue or unreasonable advantage or preference, and should further have restrained and enjoined the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company from transporting coal from one State to or through any other State for the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company, or for any firm, person, or company, at a less rate than the duly established freight rate of the said railway company in force at the time, and from further failing to observe its published tariffs, or from giving to the said New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company, or to any person, firm, or company, in any manner whatsoever, any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage, and said decree, entered by the court on the 19th day of February, 1904, in addition to the provisions thereof, should have enjoined and restrained the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company and its officers and agents from seeking or accepting, in any manner, any direct or indirect rebate of the duly established freight rates of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company on any interstate commerce, and from seeking or accepting in any manner from said railway company any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage."

The contention, therefore, is that whenever a carrier has been adjudged to have violated the act to regulate commerce in any particular it is the duty of the court not only to enjoin the carrier from further like violations of the act, but to command it in general terms not to violate the act in the future in any particular. In other words, the proposition is that by the effect of a judgment against a carrier concerning a specific violation of the act the carrier ceases to be under the protection of the law of the land, and must thereafter conduct all its business under the jeopardy of punishment for contempt for violating a general injunction. To state the proposition is, we think, to answer it. (Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U. S., 375.) The contention that the cited case is inapposite because it did not concern the act to regulate commerce, but involved a violation of the antitrust act, we think is also answered by the mere statement of the proposition. The requirement of the act to regulate commerce that a court shall enforce an observance of the statute against a carrier who has been adjudged to have violated its provisions in no way gives countenance to the assumption that Congress intended that a court should issue an injunction of such a general character as would be violative of the most elementary principles of justice. The injunction which was granted in the case of In re Debs (154 U. S., 564) was not open to such an objection, as its terms were no broader than the conspiracy which it was the purpose of the proceeding to restrain. To accede to the doctrine relied upon would compel us, under the guise of protecting freedom of commerce, to announce a rule which would be destructive of the fundamental liberties of the citizen.

As the court below did not decide that the second and sixth sections of the act, relating to the maintenance of rates, had been violated, the injunction by it issued was not made as directly responsive to the commands of the statute on that subject as we think it should have been. We therefore conclude that the injunction below should be modified and enlarged by perpetually enjoining the Chesapeake and Ohio from taking less than the rates fixed in its published tariff of freight rates by means of dealing in the purchase and sale of coal. And as thus modified the decree below is affirmed.

Mr. HUGHES. I shall not take the time of the House for a further discussion of these questions at this time, but when the committee reports this bill I shall ask the indulgence of the House for a more detailed discussion of its merits.

The Statehood Bill.

SPEECH

OF

HON. EDWARD S. MINOR,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, January 26, 1906,

On the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. MINOR said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It is not my purpose to add generalities to the discussion of this question, but in my remarks to give the House the results of personal observations and the testimony which came to me during my visit to that section of our country which the pending bill proposes to create into a State.

It was my good fortune prior to the convening of Congress to make an extended trip through Arizona and New Mexico, and, in anticipation of considering a statehood measure, I took pains to inform myself as to the situation. In company with other colleagues in this House I traveled many hundred miles through the section, visiting all the principal towns and cities in both Territories. This gave me an opportunity of gaining concrete information, gathered from the scores of representative business and professional men I had the pleasure of meeting, and in this respect I desire to say that my inquiries were by no means confined to any particular class of individuals, nor did I talk with men for the purpose of hearing only one side of the question. In Arizona I visited Clifton, Metcalf, Morenci, Douglas, Bisbee, Tombstone, Benson, Tucson, Phoenix, Tempe, Mesa, Prescott, Crown King, Mayer, Humboldt, Grand Canyon, Flagstaff, Winslow, and Adamana. The same state of facts exists as to my visit to the cities and towns of New Mexico; so, Mr. Chairman, I believe that my observations upon this question entitle me to arrive at a just opinion as to the merits of the situation as well as to the sentiment of the people of the Territories.

Before, however, making a concrete statement of the reasons influencing me to oppose joint statehood for Arizona and New Mexico, as a Republican I am constrained to register my protest and vote as well against what in my opinion is an unnecessary and arbitrary act, unjustifiable from either the view point of public policy or party expediency, which seeks to compel submission to the report of the Committee on Rules, according to the terms of which this bill is now being considered.

Mr. Chairman, I am willing to confess that there may have been occasions in the past, and these may again arise in the future, when from the view point of public policy the majority in this House may deem it necessary to invoke the powerful machinery of the action of the committee. I deny, however, that such an occasion was present at this time, and assert that not even a semblance of a reason can be found to justify under present conditions the harsh and drastic enforcement of a proceeding which should only be invoked under the color of greatest public necessity. Even under such circumstances, and they are indeed infrequent in the history of recent years, I am doubtful whether party action at any time can be justified when legislation is secured through the enforcement of methods not compatible with such rules and procedure as should govern the deliberations of this or any other representative body.

In voicing my protest I do not seek concealment behind subterfuges of a partisan purpose, as has been frequently done under the assertion that the measure under discussion is a Republican measure. I may be pardoned for saying that I am serving no apprentice years in the Republican ranks, for through all the years of my life I have been a Republican, strictly adhering to its great party history, rejoicing in its great party achievements, and believing in its principles, and I am no less a Republican to-day because of my opposition to this bill and to the rule under which it is brought before the House.

Mr. Chairman, I am willing to confess that there are occasions when individual judgment may give way to party judgment, when the will of the majority of a party, duly expressed through a caucus of the members of the House, for the time being, absorbs the opinion we as individual Members may hold, but in this case I fail to find a reason why the committee should usurp the functions of this legislative body. The attempt is here made, through this report, not alone to stifle the opinion of individual Members, but to prevent and prohibit any change, however important, by way of amendment. To the best of my ability I have endeavored to ascertain, from the basis of either public or party necessity, some reason founded in good sense and justice which will explain the situation now confronting the House. In this case the committee not only nullifies the expressed sentiment of practically the unanimous voice of the people of Arizona, but to my mind nullifies a principle, basic and sound, upon which rests representative government. In the years of my experience as a Member of the House there have been times of partisan stress when the whip of politics not only waved over our heads, but cut deep welts into our flesh. I have endeavored to ascertain if a similar condition prevailed at this time, to explain this intensity and give a cause for the methods invoked, but truth compels the statement that, neither in binding party principle, nor in convention declaration, can I find anywhere the mandate destroying the right of any loyal Republican to vote upon this question as his judgment and knowledge of the situation may dictate.

Only from the committee, Mr. Chairman, and from those who upon this floor assume that their word is the voice of the Republican party, alone can the inference be taken that in this report can be found any question of vital concern to the Republican party. I am not willing to concede, for one, that all the wisdom of the Republican party is to be found with the committee, or that this committee has the right to say what is or what is not orthodox Republicanism. What strange assumption of authority is this, that three Members of the House, supposedly selected as the instruments of legislative will, should become the masters of the body that gave them being? It may be that there are Republicans on the floor of this House who have delegated their Republicanism to the Committee on Rules, together with other rights the committee assumes to exercise, but as for me, I have not yet become a political automaton, so I raise my voice and register my vote in protest. What is the political exigency, where the necessity, of such an assumption of authority? In the making of a law as important as is the legislation which adds new stars to the sisterhood of States can it be possible that the judgment of three members of this House is better, more wise, and more just than the judgment of the people of Arizona themselves, who in almost one voice protest against the action such as is planned by the committee? Is it possible to conceive that these three men can raise the cry of party fealty and loyalty and thus silence the cry for justice and right coming to us from the people whose interests are in the balance?

Possibly it may be, Mr. Chairman, that I have not kept pace with the onward progress of events, and incline too greatly to the traditions, history, and methods of the Republican party as a safe and sure guide to influence my political conduct. Accepting these, however, as a safer and better creed and a surer foundation of right than the arbitrary act of a committee, which for the time being assumes the power to speak for my party, I believe that I am justified at this time in briefly calling attention to the danger as well as injustice of the action contemplated under the rule. There never has been a time in the history of the Republican party, from the day of its birth to the present, when it was not responsive to every reasonable demand made upon it. It has ever been the instrument through which have been achieved the best results of equal advantage to all the people of our country. It has ever been faithful to the trust imposed, and the pages of history give fair credit where credit is due. At no time has any act of the Republican party oppressed any people, and I assert that the oppression and injustice of the act sought to be enforced by the committee—favoring joint statehood of Arizona and New Mexico—is not a Republican act in spirit, for it is not in conformity with the usage the Republican party accords to the people whose voice is raised in protest.

For holding to the belief that it is neither within the right nor power of any three men acting as a committee of this House to pass upon my Republicanism I am held to be an "insurgent." For disputing the right of these same men and denying that they have the rightful power and authority, through delegation or otherwise, to say this law shall pass and that law shall not pass, and, in addition, prescribing the exact form as well as all rules governing the debate, amendment, and disposition of any measure pending before this body, an attempt has been made to qualify my Republicanism, as well as the Republicanism of other gentlemen upon this floor. With an assumption easily understood, when the purposes of the committee's activity as well as intensity is considered, the effort has been made upon the floor to show that the action of the committee is in accordance with the desires of President Roosevelt. Having assumed power never delegated to it, the committee, in order to enforce its mandates upon the House, takes refuge behind the prestige of a name and influence we all respect. While the views of President Roosevelt upon the statehood question are well known, his views upon an un-Republican act, such as may well be termed the assumption of authority by the committee, are not known. No one questions the right of President Roosevelt to make to Congress such recommendations as he deems necessary, but no one—unless perchance it is our Committee on Rules—will assume that he has selected this committee as the instrument through which Congress acts, thus nullifying the very spirit of a representative form of government.

Mr. Chairman, I for one am willing to stand or fall upon any test that can be applied to the Republicanism of President Roosevelt, reserving the right to act honestly upon my knowledge and convictions, and conceding to him the same right. I deny, however, the inference of gentlemen upon this floor that the President stands back of the Committee on Rules, or in his manly might would be more tolerant than are we of an act so wantonly disregardful of the rights as well as authority of the House. I permit no man to cast upon me imputations of disloyalty to President Roosevelt because of my opposition to this measure, rightfully based, as I believe, upon a careful investigation of the situation in the Territories affected by the legislation. I am opposed to and protest against the action of the committee, as I believe President Roosevelt would be were he in my position. To my mind there is a vital principle at stake in this question and one which has commanded too meager attention in the House and by the country generally. While I concede certain rights and authority, limited and defined, to a majority party represented in a deliberative body, I believe that the safety as well as the continuity of representative government demands as forceful a protest as can be made against the authority and power sought to be exercised by the committee. It seems to me that no possible argument is necessary, neither could an argument be made to rightfully demonstrate that any three men, however wisely selected from this body, should have the power to say that their will and not the will of the House should be law. This is the situation in a nutshell, and it is this condition against which I protest and cast my vote.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this statehood proposition is not a new question before Congress. We have had it here in various guises session after session. Sometimes it has taken the form of single statehood in the legislation demanded, and then again the proposition has appeared under the request for joint statehood as regards Arizona and New Mexico. In 1903 a bill creating four States from the territory included in Oklahoma, Indian Territory, New Mexico, and Arizona was defeated in the Senate. Subsequent to that succeeding sessions considered the project, but no action resulted until the last session, when the House passed the joint statehood bill joining Arizona and New Mexico. I myself voted for the measure under a misapprehension of the situation. The Senate amended the bill and the House refused to concur in the amendments, so the measure died with the Congress. During the pendency of this measure the people of both Territories protested against jointure and have continued this protest ever since.

The people of Arizona, as soon as they learned that there was danger of their being united with New Mexico to form a joint State, immediately expressed their violent opposition to any such measure. The disapproval was unanimous. The Delegate to Congress most strenuously objected. The legislature passed protesting resolutions; commercial bodies did likewise; local officials and private citizens all joined in the protest and flooded Congress with telegrams. The Territorial Bar Association sent a delegation to Washington.

The Delegate from New Mexico also objected. Their legislature passed resolutions against joint statehood and numerous other protests were made.

Believing that the Hamilton bill would be reintroduced at this session of Congress in substantially its original form, the protests continued. On May 27, 1905, a convention was called under the auspices of the Maricopa County Board of Trade to meet in Phoenix for the purpose of organizing an antijoint statehood league. Mayors of every city in Arizona, the boards of supervisors of the counties, as well as other commercial organizations were invited to appoint delegates. The Territorial central committees of the two parties held a bipartisan meeting at Phoenix and adopted resolutions. The delegates to the nonpartisan convention met and an organization was speedily effected. A committee on resolutions was selected, which drew up a set of resolutions.

These resolutions were unanimously adopted by the convention, and have since met with the universal approval of the people of the Territory. Every county in the Territory was represented, many of the delegates traveling hundreds of miles to get to the convention. The league represented all the people and business interests in every part of the Territory, irrespective of political parties. There was no division of sentiment in Arizona on this question of joint statehood. It is impossible to find a dozen men of any prominence in any line of activity who are in favor of joint statehood and who would not prefer to remain under a Territorial form of government indefinitely rather than be joined to New Mexico. Not 1 per cent of the people would vote for it. This conviction is based on the best of reasons and is unalterable.

Mr. Chairman, few people, even among those who assume to possess knowledge relating to the section of this measure proposes to create into a State, realize the vast extent of country now contained within the geographical limits of Arizona and New Mexico. In order to present some idea of distances and the enormuos area I will say that New Mexico has an area of 122,460 square miles. Arizona has an area of 112,920 square miles. Combined they would create a State of 235,380 square miles, which is larger than any State in the Union, with the exception of Texas, which on account of its size was granted the privilege when it was admitted by treaty of dividing itself at any time into five States. California, the next largest State to Texas in the Union, is smaller than the combined area of New Mexico and Arizona by 77,020 square miles—that is, the difference in areas between California and the proposed State of Arizona would be greater by over 10,000 square miles than the combined area of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut.

The shortest distance from Yuma to Santa Fe is 791 miles and from Phoenix it is 651 miles, and from personal knowledge of the situation, as well as geography of the two Territories, I can say that there is scarcely a settled community in the entire Territory of Arizona that is less than 500 miles from Santa Fe, the capital city proposed in this bill. This is a greater distance than from Boston to Washington, and in that section requires a journey by rail continuing for twenty-eight hours to go from Phoenix to Santa Fe. Many comparisons might be cited here to show the distance and cost of travel.

Mr. Chairman, I again desire to refer to the testimony which I gathered during my visit to that section of our country, almost an empire in geographical extent, and will say that I found an overwhelming sentiment among all classes of people, whatever their station in life, against joint statehood. Applying any possible test that can be used to determine sentiment, the fact can not be successfully disputed that the citizens of Arizona and New Mexico are unalterably opposed to jointure.

In this connection I can say that no one was more surprised than was I when, in the debate upon this question, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] felt constrained to accept the mandate issued by the committee and declared himself in favor of the pending bill. I well recall the receptions tendered us by the sturdy, progressive citizens of Arizona and the interest our visit occasioned. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] was a member of that party, and united with us in endeavoring to ascertain what the sentiment of the Territory was upon the question of joint statehood. One of the methods invoked was to put the question, "Do you favor joint statehood?" to the crowds which greeted us. Mr. TAWNEY himself put the question squarely to the people on one occasion, with the result that not one hand was raised in affirmative vote. When the negative side of the question was put, "Those who oppose joint statehood raise their hand," practically every hand was raised and every voice in the meeting was heard in opposition. Just how the gentleman from Minnesota can reconcile his position before this House on this bill with what he knows to be the sentiment of the people of both Arizona and New Mexico is not for me to determine, but passes my understanding. I am forced to accept this seeming incongruity as a manifestation of the power and might of the committee when it clears for action.

I have been endeavoring to find out what reason exists, if reason there is, and if not, what the whim or purpose, which seeks to enforce something upon a people that they do not want. So far as the people of Arizona are concerned, with practical unanimity they have raised their voices in protests not to be misunderstood against a plan which joins them with New Mexico. However, this sentiment is not the only reason why this measure should not pass, for those who favor joint statehood have failed to advance one single substantial reason or argument upon which their contention is based. If the rights of the people who are concerned in this proposition were not affected, and serious consequences not to be apprehended from the proposed action, I would look upon this attempt as not only ridiculous, but partaking of all the semblances of a joke, backed by some one possessing a fully developed sense of humor.

In this connection I desire to call attention to some of the exceedingly ridiculous features of this proposition, as they appear to me, at least. Originally the territory now included in Arizona and New Mexico was under one Territorial form of government. After due trial, because of the vast area, differences of population, physical conditions, and many other genuine reasons, this form of government was found to be too cumbersome and two Territories were created. It is now proposed, under the terms of this bill, to unite Arizona and New Mexico as one State, and restore, in all practical respects, the conditions prevailing before the section was divided into two Territories. In other words, after a clear demonstration of the fact that the people as well as conditions in the two Territories could not be advantageously joined under a Territorial form of Government, we are now asked by the proponents of this scheme to try an experiment which has already failed. If it is contended that Territorial government is a failure, by what assumption and upon what basis can it be asserted that there will be less a failure under statehood? To my mind, the people concerned are the best judges of this, and are better prepared to say from a positive knowledge of the situation what disposition they desire Congress to make, and they have spoken in one voice almost.

Mr. Chairman, there are racial differences as well as many other considerations which should appeal to the good judgment of the House before steps are taken to throw into official relationship people who differ essentially in language, manners, and customs, and between whom there has been for years more or less of a feud—political always, and sometimes personal. In my opinion, bringing together under State government those unmixing elements of the population can result only in harm and disadvantage. In New Mexico, those of Mexican or Spanish ancestry are largely in a majority, controlling the legislature as well as the local courts. Out of the twenty-four counties in New Mexico, eighteen had Mexican probate judges. In the legislature, translators and interpreters are used and the session laws are printed in both English and Spanish. These facts are cited to show that present conditions do not warrant the joining of the Territories into statehood, and, in my opinion, no public interest is to be subserved by so doing. On the contrary, my investigations lead me to the conculsion that statehood will create a burden of difficulty and conflict, which will retard the growth and development of the people of both Territories.

It has been contended by those who favor joint statehood that the people of Arizona and New Mexico are not the only ones interested in this proposition, but that the country generally is interested and favors the bill. Judging from the letters I am receiving from constituents who are familiar with the situation in the Territories, the sentiment against joint statehood is equally pronounced and the action proposed is protested against. Business men who have been in the Territories look upon this plan as a misdirected effort which will produce harmful results in case the bill becomes a law. I have no more personal interest in the solution of this question than any other Member of the House, but do claim that I possess the advantage of personal knowledge gained by a careful and painstaking investigation of the situation. This impells me to take the stand I do.

I know of no immediate reason, based upon a legitimate demand, which this House should consider for the admission of these Territories jointly or separately. If, however, statehood is to be forced upon the Territories, it is my judgment that we should choose the lesser of two evils, and admit each as a separate State. I do not contend for separate statehood, for it is my opinion that conditions do not warrant the step, but do assert that joining Arizona and New Mexico under conditions which prevail at this time and perhaps always will prevail is nothing short of a legislative crime, the perpetrators of which are laboring under an entire misapprehension of the sentiment of the people there, as well as of the general sentiment of the country. In racial characteristics, in language, in intense and continuing prejudices no process of amalgamation can unite the people of the two Territories so that advantageous governmental results will follow. I could furnish no end of testimony and statistics to demonstrate that my opposition to this measure is based upon good sense and justice. I submit herewith extracts from the report made by Joseph H. Kibbey, Territorial governor, to the Secretary of Interior for 1905, which, to my mind, in a concise and convincing manner give reasons sufficient to show that the proposed measure should not be passed. The extracts are as follows:

The defeat of the bill enabling New Mexico and Arizona to jointly form a State constitution, and providing for their ultimate admission to the Union as one State, was received by the people of the Territory with universal gratification. The small margin by which the defeat was effected in the Senate and the prompt avowal by the friends and advocates of that measure of their purpose to renew their efforts at the next ensuing session of Congress has, however, excited general alarm.

The proposed union is regarded by our people as a menace to the prosperity and progress of the Territory.

For more than forty years the people of the two communities have lived in separate Territories, and whatever of progress or achievement they have attained they have attained them under totally different conditions, both artificial and natural. The proposed union involves necessarily a change in those artificial conditions. Either the people of New Mexico will have to abandon her laws and customs and adopt those of Arizona or the people of Arizona will have to submit to those of New Mexico. As New Mexico has the larger population, it is not to be expected that the people of that Territory will voluntarily abandon their laws, their habits, and customs to adjust themselves to those prevalent in Arizona. There is no reason that they should do so; if there were, then those laws would long ago have assimilated themselves to our own. It is not at all probable that New Mexicans would be persuaded that Arizona laws are to be preferred to their own, nor is it any more probable that Arizonians would have preference for those of New Mexico.

* * * * * * *

There is no doubt that an overwhelming vote of the people of Arizona would be recorded against any constitution which involved the jointure of the two Territories as one State. Yet, notwithstanding that, we would be by the preponderant vote of the New Mexicans subjected irrevocably to a fundamental law against which we in vain and uselessly protested.

* * * * * * *

A more patriotic people, a people more intensely American, or more devoted to the great Union than are Arizonians, inhabits no State or Territory within its confines.

They ask most respectfully, but most earnestly, that no law shall be passed by Congress which shall make Arizona a component part of any State without the consent of her people. Do not force a union upon her.

Governor Brodie, in the report of 1904 to the Secretary of the Interior, said:

The two Territories as they stand to-day are different in many ways. They have little in common; their laws are dissimilar. It is doubtful if they could ever become reconciled to exist under one form of State government. The same local patriotism existing in Arizona is also to be found to a great extent in New Mexico, notwithstanding the claims of a few citizens of the neighbor Territory who are willing to take this form of statehood rather than none at all. I believe the merger would not be acceptable to the mass of people of either Territory.

I can not add to the protest that has already been made by the people of the Territory of Arizona against this reprehensible measure, and I have only to say that they would desire that their Commonwealth remain a Territory indefinitely rather than be joined with New Mexico. They desire to come into the Union as the State of Arizona with the present Territorial boundary, and until, in the wisdom of the nation's legislators, they are permitted to do this they are content to remain as they are, trusting in the justice of the future years to bring the boon so earnestly sought.

And so, Mr. Chairman, the testimony might be continued indefinitely, all of the highest character, coming from men whose first obligation, officially at least, is to the Federal Government. I am puzzled to find a solution to explain all this intensity in favor of a measure not asked for by the people most concerned, and who can best speak with the authority of self-interest and from the viewpoint of advantage to be derived. I might continue and enumerate the names of scores of men I talked with, and give the substance of their observations made to me upon this proposition, and so might other Members upon this floor who have visited the Territories, but testimony, as well as my own observations, are all of a nature to force the conviction and intensify the belief that there is nowhere in either Territory a sentiment upon which can rightfully be based this contemplated action.

Mr. Chairman, as a Republican growing old in the service of a party I have always affiliated with, the traditions, history, and record of which I have ever honored, I desire to enter the strongest possible protest against this act and the methods which seek to fasten responsibility upon my party. In the frenzy of temporary power, in the bitterness of a reaching out for personal prestige, fundamentals are sometimes forgotten, and so in this instance, the established principles of Republicanism may possibly give way in the handling of misguided and misinformed partisanship. These principles stand and will continue to stand as a better test for Republicans and for the people of our country generally than the acts of individuals who for the time being may lead. Representation in government has ever been a principle of Republicanism, sacred and continuing to-day in its influence, and as strong as when the tenets of Republican faith were proclaimed by the fathers of the party. These principles are in opposition to an act such as is the one under consideration, for no heed is given to the voice of the people raised in protest against taking from them their liberty and rights, and under an assumption of power, destroying for the time being even the semblance of a representative form of government. The Republicanism to which I adhere, and its tested and enduring principles, give me a higher and better faith than the stress of a partisanship and narrowness seldom equaled in the history of Congressional method. Republicanism means more to me than the whip of a lash in the hands of men who have neither the right nor the power to waive it over my head and proclaim that unless I submit my convictions of right and justice to their keeping my party loyalty is in question. If to stand by the enduring principles illuminated by the declarations of Lincoln and by all the fathers of our party, who raised their voices and devoted their lives so that freedom's heritage would be in no man's keeping, makes me less a Republican, I am willing to abide by the consequences of my act.

To Provide Corporal Punishment for Wife Beaters in the District of Columbia.

OF

HON. ROBERT ADAMS,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, December 15, 1905,

On the resolution (H. Res. 42) for the distribution of the President's message.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I ask the serious attention of the House to a question which some uninformed persons are inclined to treat in a spirit of levity—the bill to provide corporal punishment for wife beaters in the District of Columbia. Surely a measure that was suggested by our President, unanimously indorsed by the three Commissioners and by the chief of police of the District, supported by his statistics, which are a terrible surprise as to the prevalence of the crime, is not one to be laughed aside by sarcasm or caricature.

Mr. Chairman, I quote from the President's message addressed to the Fifty-eighth Congress, on page 13, in which he says:

There are certain offenders, whose criminality takes the shape of brutality and cruelty toward the weak, who need a special type of punishment. The wife beater, for example, is inadequately punished by imprisonment, for imprisonment may often mean nothing to him, while it may cause hunger and want to the wife and children who have been the victims of his brutality. Probably some form of corporal punishment would be the most adequate way of meeting this kind of crime.

Mr. Chairman, in pursuance of that suggestion by the President I have introduced a bill into this House which, as it is short, I will read for your information. It is as follows:

H. R. 17115.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever hereafter any male person in the District of Columbia shall beat, bruise, or mutilate his wife the court before whom such offender shall be tried and convicted shall direct the infliction of corporal punishment upon such offender, to be laid upon his bare back, to the number of lashes not exceeding thirty, by means of a whip or lash of suitable proportions and strength for the purpose of this act.

SEC. 2. That the punishment provided in the first section of this act shall be inflicted by the marshal of the District of Columbia, or by one of his deputies, within the prison inclosure, and in the presence of a duly licensed physician or surgeon and of the keeper of the said prison or one of his deputies, but in the presence of no other person.

Mr. Chairman, twenty-two years ago, when I had the honor to sit in the senate of Pennsylvania, representing one of the districts of Philadelphia, a constituent put in my charge a similar bill to repress this crime and inflict a proper punishment. I thought so little of it that I declined all personal responsibility for it, and introduced it "by request." Strange to say, the committee, instead of allowing it to die in the pigeonhole of the committee room, reported it adversely to the senate chamber, an unusual proceeding. Being rather nettled, I addressed the senate on the subject, and to my surprise and to the surprise of everybody the bill was placed on the calendar by the necessary two-thirds vote in spite of the adverse report of the committee to the contrary. [Applause.]

Almost the entire press of Pennsylvania took up the subject in its advocacy and support. I began to look into this subject seriously, and I assure you from that day to this I have been thoroughly impressed with the advisability of such legislation to put down this brutality. More than that, I have gone into the economical side of the question, and if the House will bear with me I will show that it is in the interest of the taxpayers to enact this legislation.

Many historians have agreed that the treatment of women as a nation is one of the best tests of its progress in civilization. A short review will testify to the soundness of this conclusion. In savage life, in which prowess alone commands distinction, the comparative feebleness of woman deprives her of recognition, and she is the mere slave of man for labor and drudgery. This is equally true of the barbarians of the past, or the savage of Brazil and North America of the present. The first idea of a wife seems to have arisen from the power to obtain and retain possession of a woman. We read in the Bible of the capture of wives from the daughters of the Shiloh for the children of Benjamin. The early history of the Greeks, Romans, and Hebrews is filled with expeditions made for no ostensible reason save that of procuring wives. Walter Scott says that the Macgregors captured a wife in 1750 for Robin Oig; a date so recent that the deed might be set down to fiction did we not know that it was necessary to pass a law in England in the third year of Henry VII's reign making it a capital offense to carry away a woman without her consent. The next step in the matrimonial relation was the sale of daughters among the semicivilized tribes. This had the improvement of giving fathers and brothers some say in the disposition of the woman, and of at least rejecting brutal alliances. The Egyptians stand out in bold relief in respect to their treatment of women during the reign of the Pharaohs, but as their advanced state of civilization at that time is well known, it but adds a proof to the validity of the test before named.

The legal status of woman was changed early in the Greek law, and from that of a chattel to be sold, the father paid a sum of money to the bridegroom, which was the beginning of the custom of "dowry." This was secured to her, in case of separation, as well as an allowance from her husband, if he were the guilty cause of a divorce. Thus, a fixed legal status with personal rights was first given by Greek law. This raised her position in the marital state, and she became the companion instead of the plaything of the husband. The "Patria Potestas" of early Rome gave absolute authority to the father over the family. He could sell his daughter to one of his own selection, and his authority was transferred to the husband as to the fortune and even the life of his wife. More mature Rome jurisprudence improved the status of the female to the extent of inheritance of property and its retention independently of her husband. The fall of Rome and the institution of feudalism had a disastrous effect on the social and legal position of women. Marital service was the indispensable qualification of the right to hold property. Deprived of this, her personal rights were soon abridged. During the whole Anglo-Saxon period the law gave the power to the husband to exercise restraint by correcting her if necessary. Civil law allowed the husband for some misdemeanors "flagellis et festibus acriter verberare uxorum," and for others only "modicum castigationen adhibere." Authorities do not agree as to what constituted a moderate castigation, or the instrument wherewith it was to be inflicted. Welsh law fixes as a proper allowance "three blows with a broomstick on any part of the body except the head." A second law limits the size of the stick at the "length of the husband's arm and the thickness of his middle finger." Another rule was that "a man may lawfully correct his wife with a stick no bigger than his thumb." No wonder, then, when Justice Brooke (12 Henry VIII, fol. 4) affirms "that if a man beat an outlaw, a traitor, a pagan, his villein, or his wife it is dispunishable, because by the law common these persons can have no action." He says "God send gentle woman better sport or better compane." But said Blackstone, in his Commentaries, "With us in the politer reign of Charles II this power of correction begins to be doubted, and a wife may now have security of the peace against her husband. Yet the lower rank of people, who were always fond of the old common law, still claim and exact their ancient privilege." It was not until 1829 that the act of Charles II, which embodied the old common law and allowed a man to "chastise his wife with any reasonable instrument," was repealed.

The legal position of women in this, our century, is fully established, so far as her rights to property are concerned, and she is amply protected against her husband squandering her wealth, be it real or personal. Her person itself occupies a less secure position, and even the remedy offered by law is not available to her, owing to the attending consequences, and this in spite of the Constitution of the country guaranteeing the right of enjoying and defending life and liberty. The usual proceeding "in civiliter" of suit against her husband for damages resulting from assault and battery is denied her, owing to her marital state, while the criminal prosecution, with the penalty of imprisonment, deprives her and her children of needed support, which anticipated result is frequently a bar to her even seeking protection. The binding of her husband to keep the peace, or the order of maintenance by the magistrate, has been found to be futile, especially among the class to which most wife beaters belong, namely, drunkards, who are the only class allowed to take the law in their own hands and inflict corporal punishment on their wives for alleged faults existing only too often in their intoxicated brain, while fines and costs simply deprive the injured mother and innocent children of the necessities to sustain life. Referring to the prevalence of the inhuman crime of wife beating, Darwin says, "With the exception of the seal, man is the only animal in creation which maltreats its mate, or any female of its own kind."

Judicial statistics leave no question as to the extent of the crime. In England and Wales, issue of 1877, we find that of aggravated assaults on women and children brought under summary jurisdiction there were reported in 1876, 2,737; in 1875, 3,106; in 1874, 2,481, and of these it is estimated that four-fifths were assaults made by husbands on their wives. It is in centers of dense mercantile, manufacturing, and mining populations that the crime was most prevalent. In London the largest returns for one year (Parliamentary reports of brutal assaults) of brutal assaults on women were 351; in Lancashire, 194; in Stafford, 113; West Riding, 15, and in Durham, no fewer than 267, with a population of only 508,666.

Mr. Chairman, I will insert an abstract from "The Wife Beaters' Manual, a Guide to Husbands' Connubial Corrections," published in London in 1884 by the author, Henry Romeike, founder of the press clipping bureau which bears his name.

What the English courts charge for wife beating:

Two shillings 6 pence, throwing the fire irons at the head of his wife.

Five shillings, beating his wife on the head with a piece of wood two months after marriage.

Six shillings, beating his wife several times, kicking her with his feet in the breast, tearing her hair out, trying to strangle her, and knocking her against the bed.

Another, pushing his wife in the fire and burning her hands.

One pound sterling, a black eye, trying to cut his wife's throat, kicking her in the breast, throwing a cup of hot tea in her face after having boxed her ears.

Two pounds sterling, two black eyes, knocking her over the head and splitting it open.

Three pounds sterling, kicking her in the stomach, disabling her for weeks to do any work.

Here is the fun a man can have in England for six months' imprisonment: He may cut his wife's face with a knife, beating her with a lamp, break one (only) of her arms, kick her while she is helpless on the ground, and tear off her clothes and burn them.

Surely these punishments are a travesty on justice and not calculated to restrain these brutes from repeating their crime.

In America it has been impossible to secure any published statistics, but to supply the place of such records the following interrogatories were sent to every district attorney in the State of Pennsylvania, and their replies have been tabulated to show the results:

I. During the last year how many complaints were made to the grand jury for wife beating or for assault and battery on wives by their husbands?

II. How many true bills were found?

III. How many convictions were obtained, and what was the average term of sentence?

IV. The nationality of the condemned?

V. In your opinion is the crime on the increase?

VI. Do you know if the families of the condemned, or what proportion of them, became a charge upon the county for want of support?

VII. Were the condemned under the influence of liquor at the time of committing the crime? Please return, etc.

a Wife desertion.

Five hundred and twenty-five brutal complaints by wives against their husbands for brutal beatings in one year is a terrible showing for a State so long settled and so far advanced in civilization in other respects as is Pennsylvania. Three hundred and thirty-seven of the complaints were pronounced well founded by the grand jury, and 211 husbands were convicted for terms averaging three months each, thus depriving their families of necessary support. Would that we could flatter ourselves that these returns showed the full extent of this crime in that Commonwealth, but it is probably ten times as great as is directly apparent. It will be noticed that there is no return from the coal regions of Luzerne County. Attention is also called to the prevalence of wife beating in Camden, N. J., which, except for geographical lines, is part of Philadelphia. The tabulated reports represent only the aggravated assaults, in which the wife, driven to desperation by repeated assaults, seeks to have her husband imprisoned.

Hundreds of minor cases appear before the justices of the peace or are settled before trial. This fact is established by the voluntary remarks of the several district attorneys. He of Lycoming County says: "The statement does not by any means represent the extent of the crime. Many prosecutions are settled before the justices that we never hear of. Many more wives are abused who will not make a complaint." The prosecutor of Northampton County says: "There probably have been many more such cases returned for trial during the year, but settled by parties before bill is found. Many more have been settled by the justices of the peace and no returns made to court." Blair County: "I have had a great many cases of wife beating, but only some three or four have come to trial; all generally settled, and frequently before preliminary hearing." Montgomery County: "Desertion cases, which are disposed of on hearing without jury trial, develop a large amount of wife beating. These are not included in the queries. During the past year wife beating was developed in ten desertion cases." The district attorney of Erie County says: "I find that a certain class of Englishmen beat their wives from habit." Dauphin County: "Only two specific charges of assault and battery on wives, but in many desertion or maintenance cases the testimony showed personal violence by husbands."

Clearfield County reports: "Forty complaints have been made before magistrates in addition to complaints appearing in court." In the thickly settled mining regions of Schuylkill County the preserver of the peace writes: "Thirty-six cases were returned by justices of the peace and were bound over by the judges for good behavior. Then we had about forty cases in which there was no trial from the fact that the wives asked the court to withdraw the prosecution of the defendant, as his imprisonment would leave the families in want." It is needless, in order to establish the prevalence of this crime, to quote from others who write in a similar strain.

Further, it will be noticed that wife beating exists to a greater extent, though not exclusively, among the foreign population, and it is certainly desirable that the baneful influence of the practice should be promptly checked before contaminating our native-born people.

To the question, "Were the condemned under the influence of liquor at the time of committing the crime?" the answer is almost invariably in the affirmative. Here is a thought for those interested in the temperance cause. What effect would the whipping post have on these drunken brutes? From eleven counties and from Camden comes the disheartening statement that in the opinion of the men best able to judge the crime is on the increase.

Surely, with its prevalence in many counties and its increase in others, the present law is proved to be inadequate, and legislation is necessary on the subject.

The knowledge of the frequency of wife beating will be startling to the community and the inadequacy of the present punishment evident. Infliction of punishment should always have a twofold end—the reform of the criminal and the prevention of the committing of the crime by others. Hobbes says: "In revenges or punishments man ought not to look at the greatness of the evil past, but the greatness of the good to follow, whereby we are forbidden to inflict punishment with any other design than for the conviction of the offender and the admonition of others." The latter has the greatest interest for the public for its own safety and that of its property.

The ordinary procedure, when complaint is made, is before justices of the peace, to whom the wife applies to have her husband bound over to keep the peace or to provide maintenance. These cases are usually settled, the wife preferring to risk a second beating rather than deprive herself and offspring of food and shelter. The risk of such deprivation likewise deters the magistrate. The district attorney of Cameron County writes: "The greatest difficulty in enforcing the law properly and punishing wife beaters arises from the fact that the wives themselves in every instance come into court and beg their husbands' release. This has been my experience and my predecessor says his was the same. Summary conviction before a magistrate and the whipping post within an hour after the crime would, in my opinion, be a good way to prevent the constant occurrence of this crime."

The district attorney of Schuylkill County says: "There were about forty cases in which there was no trial, from the fact that the wives asked the court to withdraw the prosecution. To imprison the defendant would only leave their families in want."

The district attorney of Lycoming County testifies: "Except in aggravated cases settlement is encouraged, because the parties are all poor and have no money for the costs and fines, and their families suffer while they are in prison."

The district attorney of Pittsburg writes: "In most cases the wives come into court and beg for the release of their husbands."

The district attorney of Philadelphia says: "I have no doubt the imprisonment of the wife beater in a large majority of cases causes very great suffering to the innocent families. More, indeed, than his incarceration inflicts on him."

In the more formal and protracted procedure of complaint and indictment by the grand jury, followed by trial in court, the objections noted rise to even a greater degree of force, and Judge Mitchell, of Philadelphia, informed me that in cases in which conviction has been had he has invariably been appealed to by the wife to impose only a short sentence, as long imprisonment meant starvation to the family of the convicted.

Confinement in the county jail, where not even hard labor is imposed, has no terror for a brute so demoralized that he will strike a woman—his physical inferior—and by nature he is incapable of feeling for those suffering at home.

It has been urged that wives would not inform on their husbands and expose them to the disgrace of being whipped. But at least they would have a chance, and it will be seen from the testimony given that the law, as at present existent, does not even give them any option, for with the want of food staring them in the face they dare not complain. The punishment of the lash is not open to the objection that want will follow to the complainants, and if they have a remedy and prefer to suffer, it is for them to decide. Wife beating is not done openly where the law can see and take cognizance of the breach of the peace, and that the law may be put in motion it is essential that the wife should be placed in an untrammeled position, free to protect herself by making complaint.

There is an economic side to the whole matter which affects the community far more than the mere horror of the brutality of the offense. Society is an organization to protect itself. The combining of the weaker against the strong and the employment of the machinery of the law offer comparative safety to the individual. To sustain the system society is willing to be taxed; to have prisons built; judges and prosecuting attorneys paid; police hired; convicts immured and supported, and for every murderer hung or incarcerated the sense of increased security for his person is a return to the individual for the tax paid, and the conviction of each thief is a consideration received on account of the premium paid for the security of property.

What relation does the crime of wife beating bear to the taxpayer beyond the shock to his feelings of humanity? It affects the citizen in no degree if the brute plies his vocation every day of the year. The person of the taxpayer, if anything, is less secure, for the brute from force of habit in inflicting pain might assault others who were his physical inferiors, while the property of the taxpayer, if the brute is convicted and sentenced, is taxed to support him in jail. The evil does not end here, for the chances are largely in favor of the wife and children of the criminal being left a charge on the county as inmates of almshouses during his imprisonment. The number of persons who thus become a charge upon the county it is next to impossible to estimate. In reply to the inquiry on this subject the several district attorneys were unable to give information save in a few cases, and as commitments only read, "assault and battery," no information can be gleaned from the prison registers.

The men convicted of this crime are married, and with the average family the number of persons deprived of support can not be small. The incomplete returns give 211 convictions with an average sentence of three months each, which, at 25 cents per diem, makes a charge upon the taxpayer of over $5,000 annually for supporting these brutes in idleness. Not a pleasant thought, certainly. Of course the subject might be pursued further in this direction, and we might discuss as a matter of loss to the State the pay of jurors, witness fees, also the time wasted by courts and attorneys in trials of wife beaters while important civil cases awaited adjudication. An additional loss is the money spent in the purchase of the alcoholic stimulant with which these brave men fortify themselves for the heroic deed of attacking their wives—their physical inferiors—to say nothing of the further loss due to the habit of idleness acquired during their imprisonment without labor. But enough has been adduced to support, from an economic view, the passage of a law to suppress this crime.

Mr. Chairman, in a recent debate in the senate of Pennsylvania objection was raised by a senator, not trained in the law, that the proposed punishment was in violation of the constitutions of the United States and of that Commonwealth. The amendment to the Constitution of the United States forbids "cruel and unusual punishment." This is a restriction of the Federal Government, and not upon the States. It is inapplicable to offenses against the State. This is well recognized, and has been adjudicated in the case of Barker v. The People. (3 Cow (N. Y.), 686.) The law as it existed in the slave States formerly, and as it exists in Delaware and Maryland to-day, is a sufficient answer to the objection.

It will be noticed that the constitution of Pennsylvania does not retain the wording of the bill of rights (1 William and Mary), as does the Constitution of the United States, but omits the word "unusual." That this omission was designed by the framers there can be no question, as the original phrasing was of too ancient a date and too familiar to be mistaken, and formed one of the most pronounced declarations of that statute which established security of personal liberty. In interpreting the portion of the bill of rights cited, James Fitzjames Stephens says, "No doubt the flogging of Oats and others who were sentenced were the cruel punishments which Parliament referred to." Macauley, in describing the infliction of the sentence, says that Oats was expected to die. He was whipped twice at an interval of two days. "The hangman laid on the lash with such unusual severity as showed that he had received special instructions. The blood ran in rivulets." On the second whipping he received 1,700 lashes. It was to the prevention of such cruel and unusual punishment as this that the provision of the bill of rights was directed, and not against whipping itself. This is substantiated by the fact that "whipping has never been formally abolished for common-law misdemeanors" (Stephens), but, on the contrary, has been named as punishment to be inflicted in the acts 26 and 27 Victoria, C. 44, where the number of whippings, and the instrument to be used, and the number of strokes to be inflicted are set forth. In 1863 this statute, the garroters act, was passed by Parliament, discretionary power being given to the judge to inflict the additional punishment of flogging, and this most atrocious crime of strangling, which had held London in terror for several years, disappeared after one or two convictions.

These statutes plainly show that in England the section of the bill of rights against cruel and unusual punishments is held not to refer to whipping properly administered as a punishment.

In Pennsylvania, up to the time of the adoption of the constitution of 1790, in which was first inserted the restriction against cruel punishment, the provisions of 1 William and Mary were in force, and to show that the interpretation in that State was the same as that in England I cite the act of March 10, 1780 (1 Smith's Laws, 501), in which punishment for horse stealing is prescribed. "Every such person or persons so offending, for the first offense, the offender shall stand in the pillory for one hour and shall be publicly whipped on his or on their bare back with thirty-nine lashes well laid on." And the act of March 16, 1785, prescribes that for counterfeiting the offender "shall be sentenced to the pillory, to have both his or her ears cut off and nailed to the pillory." These were not considered cruel and unusual punishments under the bill of rights, nor can they be held to be in violation of the clause of the constitution of 1790, for they remained statutes after its adoption for nearly fifty years, and were only repealed by the act of April 3, 1829, although it may be a question as to what was the effect on this subject of the acts of April 5, 1790, and April 22, 1794. The present constitution of Pennsylvania retains the clause of the former constitution verbatim in regard to cruel punishment, and as the case is in no wise changed, I hold that there is no constitutional prohibition preventing the passage of the law inflicting whipping as a punishment.

The question of flagellation as a punishment has received much more attention than perhaps the Members of this House are aware and from very serious sources. It has long been debated whether flagellation as a punishment or flagellation as a penance was the more ancient of the two kinds of whippings; but the Rev. William M. Cooper, in his History of the Rod, decides that corporal punishment is as old as sin, and that voluntary flagellation was in imitation of punishment inflicted on themselves by those feeling guilty of such sins as they had committed. That whipping is one, if not the oldest, mode of punishment history offers ample proof. In Exodus we read that Pharaoh flagellated the Israelites. In the laws of Moses flagellation was imposed for certain offenses, the number of lashes being limited to forty. Jesus Christ was scourged before crucifixion. The Romans carried the practice of flagellation further, perhaps, than any other nation. Horace tells of the nicety to which it was administered in his accounts of the "Ferula, the Scutica, and the terrible Flagellum."

The celebrated cases of Henry II, in England, and Miss Cadiere, in France, suffice as examples of the middle ages, while Austria, Russia, China, Turkey, and Siam at the present day apply the rod in various forms as a means of punishment. But it is far from my object to advocate whipping as a punishment in general or to approve the law as it exists in the State of Delaware to-day. The object is only to urge whipping as a remedy for the crime of wife beating, and in so urging I am in consonance with the doctrine laid down by James Fitzjames Stephens, the ablest judge that ever sat in an English criminal court, and one of the most learned writers on criminal law. In his history he says: "The view which I take of the subject would involve the increased use of physical pain, by flogging or otherwise, by way of secondary punishment. It should, I think, be capable of being employed at the discretion of the judge in all cases in which the offense involves cruelty in the way of inflicting pain or in which the offender's motive is lust. In each of these cases the infliction of pain is what Bentham calls a 'characteristic punishment.' The man who cruelly inflicts pain on another is made to feel what it is like. The man who gratifies his own passions at the expense of cruel and humiliating insult inflicted on another is most fearfully and shamefully humiliated." In 1874 the home office of England issued a circular requesting opinions whether flogging should be authorized in cases of assault, especially on women and children. There was a great unanimity of opinion that the law as it stood was insufficient, and that the penalty of flogging should be added to the list of sanctions. Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, Justices Blackburn, Meller, Lush, Quain, Archibald, Brett, Grove, Lord Chief Baron Kelly, and Barons Bramwell, Piggott, Pollock, Cleasby, and Amphlet were all of this opinion. Lord Coleridge and Mr. Justice Denman were hesitating, and Mr. Justice Keating, of all who sat upon the bench, was the only opponent of flogging.

The chairman and magistrates in sessions were, in sixty-four cases out of sixty-eight, in favor of whipping. The recorders of forty-one towns were likewise in favor of it, only three entering their protest against it. When, at the session of the legislature, a bill to establish the whipping post for wife beaters was introduced in the senate by the speaker he was flooded with letters from within and without the State in support of the bill, and copies thereof asked for even from Canada. The proposed act received the almost unanimous support of the public press. In the interrogatories sent to the several district attorneys the direct question of their opinion as to the establishment of the whipping post as a punishment was not asked for two reasons: First, in the agricultural counties the crime exists to a slight extent only, and the attorneys, probably in ignorance of its prevalence elsewhere, would naturally see no necessity for it; in the second place, the reasons for imposing whipping as a punishment solely for the crime of wife beating have but recently been given to the public. The following voluntary remarks, therefore, have double force as spontaneous opinions of the public prosecutors. The district attorney of Schuylkill County says: "There is a growing sentiment in this county in favor of your bill. Our judge has spoken favorably of it, and reminded a defendant, as he was about to sentence him, that he hoped that the day was not distant when wife beaters would be punished as directed in your bill." The district attorney of Westmoreland County adds: "As a rule, the same parties, in a year or so, turn up in court again for the same offense. The whipping post is the only adequate punishment for the offense." The district attorney for Cameron County testifies: "The law in its present condition is utterly powerless to prevent this crime.' Summary conviction before a magistrate and the whipping post within an hour after the crime would, in my opinion, be a good way to prevent its reoccurrence." The district attorney of Adams County puts a P. S.: "Your proposed correction of this evil, when the case is clearly established, meets with my hearty approval." Forest County: "A law to flog wife beaters would be good." The judgment of the district attorney of Bradford is: "We ought to have the old whipping post in Pennsylvania, and nothing else will so effectually check this most dastardly crime."

The district attorney of Franklin writes: "I heartily favor the whipping post." Clearfield County, represented by district attorney, says: "In the writer's opinion, the Delaware whipping post would be a salutary preventive for this crime." The opinion of the experienced district attorney of Philadelphia, who presented 308 bills to the grand jury and convicted 80 brutes of this cowardly crime, is: "In my judgment, the re-establishment of the whipping post or some mode of corporal punishment, inflicted privately, would be more effective to reduce the number of wife beaters than the punishment of incarceration." Three grand juries of Philadelphia County recommended the passage of this bill to the legislature, and four called the attention of the public to the prevalence of the crime. The opinions of the judges of the court of common pleas of the State, on the advisability of whipping as a remedy for wife beating, are generally unknown to the speaker, but the mature judgment of the two judges longest in service on the Philadelphia bench—Judge Allison and Judge Ludlow (his junior but a few years)—both favored the proposed punishment.

In 1883 the legislature of Maryland passed a bill to punish wife beaters by whipping them, and the district attorney of Baltimore informed the speaker that after the first conviction the crime ceased as if by magic in that State.

Mr. Chairman, I will insert a letter from the district attorney, of Wilmington, Del., relative to the effect of the act passed by that State subsequent to the act establishing whipping for minor crimes. Also the letter of the superintendent of police of the District of Columbia, showing 500 cases of wife beating in two years. With this last and recent unanswerable testimony, I close my argument in favor of the whipping post for the offense of wife beating, feeling fully persuaded that the sentiment which exists to a certain extent against whipping as a punishment will, as did my own feeling, change when the facts are known and when it is well understood that it is proposed to inflict corporal punishment solely in cases of wife beating.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF UNITED STATES ATTORNEY,
DISTRICT OF DELAWARE,
Wilmington, December 20, 1905.

Hon. ROBERT ADAMS, Jr.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of December 19, 1905, asking for statistics as to the effect of the wife-beating statute in Delaware. I have been unable to obtain any satisfactory statistics, but I am assured by the city and county prosecuting officers that the effect of the statute has been very salutary.

Respectfully,
JOHN P. NIELDS,
United States Attorney, District of Delaware.

HEADQUARTERS METROPOLITAN POLICE DEPARTMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, December 19, 1905.

Hon. ROBERT ADAMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a memorandum showing the number of cases of arrest in this jurisdiction where the charge was assault or assault and battery on women. The statistics are based on the records where the wife, or person of the same name as the defendant, was the complaining witness, as under existing law the charge is one of assault. Many of these cases were dismissed or nolle prosequied upon the request of the prosecuting witnesses.

If you will pardon the suggestion, I believe it would add to the completeness of your bill if you would include among those whom it would make subject to the penalty to be imposed the individuals who assault common-law wives or other females, as numerous instances of the kind have been recorded.

In my annual reports to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia I have heretofore expressed a favorable opinion for such a measure as you propose.

With best wishes, permit me to be,
Very truly,
RICHD. SYLVESTER,
Major and Superintendent.

MEMORANDUM.

The number of arrests on the charge of assaulting wives during the past two years was:

	Cases.

Distribution of President's Message.

OF
HON. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN,
OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, December 15, 1905,

On the resolution (H. Res. 42) for the distribution of the President's message.

Mr. GOULDEN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The eloquent periods of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], as usual, are interesting. With his accustomed vigor he assailed the insurance companies of the country, showing a lack of knowledge of the subject that was not unexpected by the Members of the House.

He is nothing if not dramatic, and is always found on the radical side of all public questions. His statements were either without foundation or greatly exaggerated. For instance, his comparisons between savings banks and life-insurance companies, that in the first named you could withdraw your deposit at any time, while in the latter this could only be done at death, with the earnings. No comment is necessary to answer this sort of an argument. Again, he stated that the sums paid managers and agents was a robbery of the policy holders both unnecessary and unjustifiable. He further stated that the companies should be limited to the States in which they were located, and Congress should inquire whether they were not contrary to a republican form of government.

The gentleman's logic reminds me of a story of the presiding elder of a colored conference in Maryland. He said that his most difficult task was to keep the local preachers in his charge straight on theology. As an instance he related a recent experience. In visiting one of his churches he found the local preacher holding forth on hell. His description made the brothers and sisters tremble with terror. He said: "Hell is a fearful place, one of suffering and torment." "Why," said he, "in hell the icicles hang to your mouth, to your nose, to your eyes, to your ears, to your hair, to your fingers, and all over you." "When the service was over," said the elder, "I took him to task about his sermon, stating that his description of hell was not sound theology, but rank heresy, as hell was a hot place, very hot, and that he must change his sermon on that subject." His reply was: "Go way, brother; you don't understand dese eastern-shore niggers; dey all has de rumatiz, and if dey thought hell was a hot place all would want to go dere at once." [Applause.] It must be clearly understood that I am not here to either apologize or defend the evils of life-insurance companies' management. I am in favor of punishing all offenders in this or any other class of evil doers. Most of the speakers on this subject uttered statements that were only partially true or one-sided. There is no cause whatever for alarm, as the life-insurance companies are entirely solvent and abundantly able to pay every dollar of their liabilities. The thousands of millions paid to the widow and orphan, with a magnificent sum of two thousand five hundred millions of good assets, when compared with the amount lost in peculations, dwarfs the latter into insignificance. In 1904 the grand sum of two hundred and fifty millions was distributed to the policy holders by American life-insurance companies. The officers' salaries, clerk hire, general office expenses, medical examiners' fees, etc., in 1904 amounted to less than $20,000,000, an excellent showing.

The losses through dishonesty in management, which should, and will be stopped, are the direct result of "the system of high finance" so prevalent in the business world. The made dollar of Wall street, the water in the stocks and bonds of corporations, has superseded the earned dollar of honest endeavor. This is directly responsible for the evil found in our life insurance companies. In the investigation now going on in New York City, though including a number of companies, nothing has been found to condemn except the three large ones usually denominated "the big three." This speaks well for the remaining eighty-five American companies against whose management nothing has been found.

The claim made on the floor of this House by my colleague from New York, that the worst has not yet been discovered, is misleading and tending to destroy the confidence of the 7,000,000 policy holders. The greatest perhaps of all evils, one that has done much harm, adding greatly to the expense of management, is the matter of discrimination of policy holders, commonly known as "rebates." In fully one-half of the business written in the last few years the insured has demanded that the agent give up all or part of his compensation. The evil grew so common that the various States passed laws against it, but, I regret to say, of little avail. The moral turpitude of the people in most cases caused them to laugh at the law and to insist on their pound of flesh. A few prosecutions and an occasional conviction were the only results of the law. The only hope is in an awakened sense of moral activity on the part of the people. They must learn to realize that laws are enacted for the public good and that they must be obeyed not through fear of punishment, but because it is right.

The President, in his message, strikes the keynote when he says:

> Of course, the only complete remedy for this condition must be found in an aroused public conscience, a higher sense of ethical conduct in the community at large, and especially among business men and in the great profession of the law, and in the growth of a spirit which condemns all dishonesty, whether in rich man or poor man, whether it takes the shape of bribery or of blackmail.

[Applause.]

If the insurance companies can be relieved from the exactions of State supervision by the establishment of a national bureau, assuming that it could be done constitutionally, I should favor it. However, I am opposed to adding to the burdens of the companies by bringing into existence an added agent of supervision. I have no hesitancy in saying that the leading Commonwealths have honest and efficient commissioners of insurance, who have done excellent work in the past. With more power and under the stimulus of the exposure of evils which have gradually crept into the business, the future will be entirely satisfactory to all concerned. National supervision under the Bureau of Corporations in the Department of Commerce and Labor, in my judgment, would not be satisfactory. A separate bureau should be established in that Department, having in charge all insurance interests and nothing else. Then the people will have a double safeguard as to their rights as policy holders. [Applause.]

Railroad Rate Bill.

SPEECH

OF

HON. WILLIAM B. LAMAR,

OF FLORIDA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 5, 1906.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission—

Mr. LAMAR said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I shall vote for this bill, because it marks a great advance over the position of this House in the Fifty-eighth Congress taken by both political parties. I congratulate this House that the "extremism" of the Fifty-eighth Congress is the "moderatism" of the Fifty-ninth Congress; that the "radicalism" of the past session is the "conservatism" of this, and that the "Hearstism" of two years ago is the "Hepburnism" of this year. I do not believe that the Representatives, in the main, of the Republican party in this House have any love for this bill to regulate railroads; I believe firmly that they are driven to the acceptance of this bill by the advanced Democratic position in this country upon railroad rate legislation. It is a bill extorted out of their fears. It is a bill wrung from their reluctant hands. William J. Bryan and William R. Hearst, as leaders, and the great majority of Democrats in the ranks throughout the country are behind this legislation. And if it were not for the fact that the Democratic party's position on railroad rate legislation has a responsible godfather in the White House in the person of Theodore Roosevelt, I affirm that this bill would not be accepted on the floor of this House by the Republican Representatives here. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have no hesitancy in saying that the mind of the American Congress for ten years past, since the "Maximum Rate case," decided in 1897 by the Supreme Court of the United States, has been hypnotized, as it were—paralyzed—by the persuasive arguments of the railroad interests of this country. There is a class of newspapers in this country directly interested in this issue. These newspapers are owned wholly or in part by trust magnates. Whenever such paper voices any sentiment it voices the sentiment of its owner. Wherever a public man has permitted his mind to dwell upon that view of the case he can not eliminate from it the idea that this legislation is radical, socialistic, unjust legislation. Wherever public men have stocks and bonds in these great corporations, wherever they have intimate friends largely interested in them, wherever social ties draw them close, all these matters operate upon their minds to make them view legislation such as this as harsh, as socialistic, and radical. And the utmost they can say in derogation of it is that it is inspired by the Democratic party, and by William J. Bryan, and by WILLIAM R. HEARST, and by Democrats generally.

I accept that characterization for one member of the Democratic party, and I wish that my party at the last session of this Congress had offered to you Republicans a bill stronger than this, a bill like the Hearst bill, and forced you then to either accept it or vote it down. At this time a bill is offered to this House containing provisions controlling private car lines, terminal road evils, the iniquitous midnight rate, in addition to the rate-revising and rate-fixing power, and all of these salutary features were embraced last year in the bill introduced in March, 1904, by Hon. W. R. HEARST.

This bill is belated remedial legislation, but is acceptable upon the old ground "better late than never."

I say to you Republicans that if you had voted down such a bill in the Fifty-eighth Congress and were to vote it down in this Congress the cataclysm that upheaved Judge Parker and buried him under a 2,500,000 plurality vote would have been but a bagatelle to the earthquake that would have entombed the Republican party in the coming Congressional elections and in the Presidential election of 1908. This bill is a bill wrung out of your fears.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me advert for a moment to the argument of the distinguished gentleman from Maine, and especially to the conclusion of that argument, an argument addressed to the monopolistic and capitalistic class in the United States; an argument addressed to their fears, to their apprehensions, and to their interests.

It is the criminally rich of this country, the predatory rich, the smug, hypocritical rich, who have extorted their moneys and filched them out of the pockets of people better than themselves, who principally denounce this proposed legislation. These are the people we are striving to reach by the legislation of this bill. Listen to the language of a railroad man, A. B. Stickney, president of the Chicago Great Western Railroad:

They have distributed to the public billions of nominal dollars engraved on bits of paper, and thus have become the possessors of wealth. A few men have become enormously rich and conspicuous. They have speculated and boomed stock. They have built houses with the most expensive, luxurious furnishings. Nothing seemed of value which is not expensive.

I will not read the next two lines, but if gentlemen of this House would like to know what they contain, consult the pages of Juvenal and read his satires upon the practices of his age. In conclusion he says:

These are the contributions which trade monopolies have made to present prosperity. Contributions of vulgarity, debauchery, and shame!

I have no hesitancy in saying that there is not a State in this American Union where the corporation element has not sought to interfere with the governmental organizations of the people. Where they have not endeavored to control the functions of the legislature, where their entire idea has been directed to arraying one man against another; and why? Because they have desired to seize hold of the legislative branch of the Government and then make laws in their interest and defeat laws that might be against their interest. I have great respect for that wealth accumulated by honorable means. It would stamp any man upon the floor of this House as unfit to hold a position here if a single statement escaped him aimed at the legitimate pursuit of this world's goods; but, sir, those who have acquired this wealth by corrupt means, those who have had their interests fattened by the abuse of their wealth, let me quote to them the language of a great lawyer of Pennsylvania, Judge Jeremiah S. Black:

Mr. Black described the contempt shown by the railroad monopolist in his day just as it is shown to-day. He said that the corporation influence in official circles is "mysterious and incalculable," and that upon the subject of a popular demand for the enforcement of law "the press is shy" and the politicians are eager to take a smoother road than that which leads to conflict with corporation chiefs.

Referring to railroad impositions, he said: "They have destroyed the business of hundreds for one that they have favored; for every millionaire they have made 10,000 paupers." He pleaded for the enforcement of existing laws and the enactment of new ones that would provide adequate protection to the public, saying that every one of these railroad magnates "can be trusted to keep clear of acts which may take him to the penitentiary."

The railroads claim to-day that they can best manage their properties; that governmental regulation is wrong. But the sole object of the railroads is that management that yields the most money.

May we not, referring to these same claims, use the language employed by Jeremiah Black when in that same speech he said: "In whatever language they clothe their argument, it is the same in substance as that with which Demetrius, the silversmith, defended the sanctity of the temple for which he made statues: 'Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth.'"

No wonder they are opposed to this legislation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall support this bill, but, in my opinion, it is greatly defective in several important particulars. It should provide some control of the classification of freight rates. It should specifically provide that this Commission should pass upon the reasonableness of an advance in price—of a contemplated rate—before it is put into execution. It should in addition to that provide that cars and all facilities for transportation be furnished by railroads to all upon equal terms, and that their refusal to furnish cars upon demand shall be a prima facie discrimination and throw the onus probandi upon the railroads to show that they are not at fault.

These are material amendments that should be made to this bill, and no bill should be permitted to go in legislation without these amendments.

Upon the general subject of classification, Mr. Chairman, and how the railroads can affect the freight rates by a mere transfer of a particular article from one class to another, much is shown by the report of the Industrial Commission, made to the Senate and House four or five years ago, in the Fifty-seventh Congress.

I quote from such report, in part, as follows:

FREIGHT CLASSIFICATION.

Attention has been directed to the significance and importance of freight classification of late, by reason of the use made of it in the recent notable advances of freight rates throughout the country. Shippers have awakened to the fact that classification is a factor of primary importance in the making of freight rates. From a public point of view, the topic is important because the supervision or control of classification apparently was not contemplated by the original act to regulate commerce. The anomalous situation is presented, therefore, of a grant of power intended to prevent discrimination in freight rates, while at the same time provision for control over an important element in such rate making was entirely omitted.

And again:

Without recommending arbitrarily the necessity for a uniform classification of freight in the United States, it seems that under the complicated system which exists at the present time there ought to be some public supervision and control. There is absolutely none at present, as will be shown in detail in a subsequent chapter, dealing with the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The mere adoption of a uniform classification, as proposed in the Cullom bill, can accomplish very little, unless with this there be coupled the proper legislation for the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission in respect to the control of rates.

To show how railroads use the device of "classification" to raise rates I submit this further extract from the report of the Industrial Commission:

THE GENERAL FREIGHT RATE ADVANCES BY MEANS OF CLASSIFICATION CHANGES.

The long-continued and steady decline of freight rates since the civil war has given way in 1900 to a marked advance in the published rates. No similar attempt, with the exception, perhaps, of the year 1894, has been made to arrest, by concerted action of all the roads of the country, this progressive decline, due to a considerable degree, as it has appeared, to competition between the railroads themselves. The peculiarity of these advances of 1900 is that they have been made, not by direct changes of tariffs, but by modification of the freight classifications. Merchandise, as is well known, is thrown into various classes according to its value, bulk, risk, etc., and the charges are graded accordingly. Consequently the transfer of a particular commodity from one class to another may operate materially to increase the rate of freight charge. Thus, for instance, the freight rate from New York to Atlanta by any all-rail line is fixed by common agreement at $1.14 per 100 pounds.

The rate on second class is 98, on third class 86, on fourth class 73, etc. It is apparent that if goods—axes, for example—which were formerly fourth class, are by a change in classification made third class, this operates to increase the rates between these points specified from 73 to 86 cents. Moreover, since these classifications, as will be shown later in this report, are agreed upon by all railroads operating within each specified territory, a change of classification operates simultaneously to increase rates throughout the entire section. The same result may be attained also by changing classification according as the goods are shipped in carloads or less than carload lots. Thus, if a commodity was formerly classified as fourth class when shipped in carloads, and as third when in less than carload lots; if the distinction between these two classes of shipment be removed and all are classified as third, whether in large or small quantity, this likewise results in an increase of the freight rate to the large shipper by the difference in the rate between third and fourth class. Or, again, as will be shown, certain commodities are sometimes exempted from classification by a special or "commodity" rate, as it is called. This commodity rate is usually very much below the rate for classified merchandise. Thus corn by the Official Classification is sixth class, and the rate from Chicago to New York for that class is 25 cents. If, however, corn actually moves under a commodity rate of 17½ cents per 100 pounds, the cancellation of the commodity rate immediately operates to put corn in class 6, thereby raising the rate to 25 cents.

Among the general recommendations of the Industrial Commission was the following one:

(f) For a specific grant of power to the Interstate Commerce Commission over classification, both as to items and grouping.

Coupled with this, however, we dissent from the section of the so-called "Cullom bill" requiring the Interstate Commerce Commission within a certain period to promulgate a uniform classification for the United States. This is not intended to detract from the importance or desirability of greater uniformity in classification, but action to this end should be taken by the carriers on their own initiative.

In aid of this contention I offer an extract of a letter from Hon. R. Hudson Burr, a member of the Florida State railroad commission, with reference to the pending bill:

I see that it gives no supervision whatever over the classification. While this bill may prevent the railroads from raising or lowering a rate or freight tariff, it will amount to very little if the railroads are to be the sole judges of classification, for that has always been the favorite instrument in their hands for tampering with rates. It is possible to change whole tariffs almost by use of the classification, and it is done.

For instance, the Florida railroad commission when it first organized adopted what was known as "Southern Classification No. 25" as the Florida classification. In about two years' time the southern classification had been changed until something like 500 articles in classification No. 25 had been raised, and at that time the railroad commission revised the Florida classification, placing back the articles thus raised by the railroads, and adopted what was known as the "Florida Classification No. 1," and now we find that again each year, when the traffic managers have met for the purpose of going over these matters, they have raised items in the southern classification until it differs materially from our classification. If they used the Florida classification on interstate shipments into Florida, it would not affect us so badly; but where the southern classification is higher they use it, and if in a remote case an item should be higher in the Florida classification they would use that. In other words, they use that which results in the highest rate.

It seems to me that it would be farce to pass a bill enlarging the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission in which they were given the right, where complaint is made of the unreasonableness of a rate, and after hearing, etc., to substitute in lieu thereof a just and reasonable rate to leave the classification entirely in the hands of the railroad people. The Commission should have supervision of the classification to the same extent that they are given supervision over the rate; that is, where an article is classed in a manner to make it unreasonable and unjust that upon complaint, investigation, and hearing the Commission should have the right, if found to be as complained of, to substitute in lieu thereof a reasonable and just classification of the article or articles complained of.

I shall offer an amendment at the proper time giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority and power over items and grouping, in order that the Commission shall have some disposition over classifications of freight, in this bill, as follows:

On page 10, section 4, line 15, after the word "regulations," insert the words "or classifications;" and after the word "regulation," in line 23, insert the words "or classification;" and on page 11, line 5, after the word "regulation," insert the words "or classification."

There is another amendment which this bill should contain. In the State of Florida the railroads, in the very midst of the shipping season of oranges, at one time advanced their freight rates, without notice, from 30 cents a box to 40 cents a box, an advance of 25 per cent. Such an advance in rates should be inquired into by the Commission before the railroads should be allowed to put the contemplated advanced freight rate into effect. The very minute an unreasonable freight rate goes into effect the rate has to be challenged and upon hearings it may be revised, but in the meantime the commerce of the country has been subjected to extortion. The Interstate Commerce Commission should have the power to determine the reasonableness of an advanced rate after notice and before it goes into effect. I shall offer that amendment as follows:

On page 6, line 6, after the word "force," insert the following:

"That when any notice of advance in rates, fares, or charges shall be filed with the Commission, the said Commission shall have authority to inquire into the lawfulness of such advance and make orders in respect thereof to the same effect as if such advanced rate, fare, or charge were actually in force. The provisions of this section shall also apply to notice of any change in classification of freight or other regulations affecting rates."

The pertinency of this proposed amendment is very apparent in reading this language from the report of the Industrial Commission made to the Congress four or five years ago—

The entire inadequacy of making rate regulation dependent upon the mere determination of rates as applied in the past without reference to the rates which shall prevail in the future is apparent on all sides. More than this, all remedy for the parties who have borne the burden of an unreasonable rate would seem to have been removed. This has been clearly described in the report of the Commission for 1897. It may be illustrated by the example of rates upon oranges. In 1890 there was a sudden advance on rates from Florida to New York from 30 to 40 cents. The Commission after an investigation ordered that the rate be reduced to 35 cents. As a matter of fact, how could this action redress grievances of those who had already paid 40 cents per box?

It was difficult, in the first place, to discover who bore the burden of the unreasonable charge; and, in the second place, it was certain that some of those who suffered could not legally sue in court. The actual shipper, who alone could sue for repayment of unreasonable charges, was a middleman who recouped himself in any event, either from the grower, the consumer, or both. He lost nothing by reason of the unreasonable rate. As a matter of fact, not any single individual, but the locality had been mulcted by 5 cents per 100 pounds, supposing that a rate of 40 cents was unreasonable. Experience shows that almost no shippers or other parties injured actually attempt to secure the restitution of moneys already paid for unreasonable charges. In only 5 out of 225 cases down to 1897 was a rebate actually sought, and in those cases $100 was the maximum sought to be recovered. As a matter of fact, the damage inflicted by the existence of such an unreasonable rate could not be measured by hundreds or perhaps by hundreds of thousands of dollars. The bearing of this citation is to show that any effectual protection to the shipper must proceed from adjudication of the reasonableness of rates before, and not after, they have been paid; that is to say, in advance of their exaction by the carrier. Power to pass upon the reasonableness of such rates prior to their enforcement, as a consequence constitutes practically the only safeguard which the shipping public may enjoy.

I shall offer a further amendment at the proper time that railroads shall be compelled to furnish facilities of transportation on equal terms to all shippers. That was a flagrant abuse of the coal trust in Pennsylvania, disclosed in the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Commission on the complaint of Mr. HEARST. There they would not give any independent operator cars. They had it in their power to break down any independent operator because the railroads were not only coal-carrying roads, they not only carried the article, but they owned the coal mines, or nearly 90 per cent of them.

This outrageous abuse ought not to be permitted, and at the proper time I shall, as I say, offer an amendment to prevent it, as follows:

That whenever any common carrier, subject to the provisions of this act, shall fail or refuse, after reasonable notice, to furnish cars to shippers for the transportation of freight as interstate commerce, or to forward and deliver such freight at destination within a reasonable time, such failure or refusal shall be deemed to constitute unjust discrimination and undue and unreasonable prejudice and disadvantage, and in any case or proceeding pending before the Commission or any circuit or district court of the United States based upon such failure or refusal on the part of any such common carrier, proof that in the furnishing of cars or forwarding or delivery of its traffic other shippers have been preferred shall not be required.

The pending bill should contain a further amendment that in fixing just and reasonable rates no regard shall be had to inflated, fictitious capitalization of railroads. This "wind and water" should not enter as an element in determining the question of just and reasonable charges.

I shall at the proper time offer this amendment:

On page 10, section 4, line 22, after the word "charged," insert the following: "in determining and prescribing what is a just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or charge the Commission shall ignore all stocks, bonds, or other obligations of the carriers so far as such stocks, bonds, or other obligations represent amounts in excess of the fair value of the property of the carrier."

I desire to quote the following from the Washington Post:

IT IS ROOSEVELT'S MEASURE.

No matter what Democratic platforms have "demanded," no matter what Democratic statesmen may claim, President Roosevelt and the Republican party are going to get the credit or reap the odium of this railroad legislation. If the "doctrine" was in a Democratic plaform, it was hopelessly inert, absolutely innocuous. Roosevelt came along, prophesied upon the dry bone, breathed into it life, and the thing stood up, a thoroughly Republican and an entirely Rooseveltian "principle." And, besides that, it is altogether too adventurous to be at all Democratic.

It will not do, even for that able journal, to claim this rate bill on behalf of the Republican party of this country. I believe the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] and the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] are correct in what they say of the Republican party. I believe with the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], that staunch old-line Republican, who knows the history of his party faithfully and its traditions—one of the ablest men of this House. All these gentleman know and declare that the demand for railroad rate legislation is of Democratic origin.

The Republican party should stand where the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] stands; it should stand where the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] stands; its natural position is with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL]. Its doctrines do not belong on this side of the House, and I repeat it again, that were it not for the impress of Bryan on the Chicago convention in 1896 and the impress of Bryan and William R. Hearst and the Democrats in 1904, and if certain elections had not occurred last year and you had not become frightened and read, as you thought, the handwriting on the wall, you Republicans would have no legislation proposed on this occasion. [Applause.]

The question before this House and before the country is principally, Shall the railroads of this country, holding great instrumentalities for good and evil in their power, have the final say what the shippers of America shall pay, or shall the shippers of America have the power of their own initiative, through direct Congressional action, to dictate terms to these railroads, or shall this Government provide an administrative tribunal, impartial in its nature and intelligent in its composition, to decide these great controversies? That is the question, and the common sense of the country has forced Congress, this House—and I hope it will force those grave and reverend seignors somewhere else—to impress upon the statute books remedial legislation demanded by the country's interests. Now, Mr. Chairman, can it be held that the rebate is the only question at issue? Why, that is an important question, but it is a collateral matter. The one great, supreme question towering above all others is the rate-revising and rate-fixing power to be vested in this Commission. Some hedge off and say there is no trouble except the rebate question.

What was the Elkins rebate law? Legislation primarily to save money to the railroads. If that was not its direct intent and purpose, it was yet its direct effect.

I quote a clipping I have here, and I think it was taken from the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It throws a fine light upon the patriotic Elkins bill:

The object of the Elkins law was commendable. The abuses it corrected, as well as other greater evils, had been repeatedly condemned by the Interstate Commerce Commission and by many commercial organizations throughout the country. Still the important result of this Elkins law, from a railroad standpoint, was that it enabled the railroads to retain in their treasuries those large amounts of money which they had previously paid to favored shippers, and this probably accounts for the ease and celerity with which this legislation was enacted.

The main question at issue is not the rebate. It is the unjust, unreasonable, excessive, extortionate railroad rate itself.

Railroad interests make the flimsy statement that railroad rates are not too high and that in recent years they have not been advanced. I quote a competent authority against that statement of the railway interests. I quote Judge Prouty, a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, fitted by experience to express an opinion. At Boston before the Economic League he made the following statement:

Nevertheless, there are actually pending before that Commission at present complaints where the only issue is the reasonableness of some advance in freight rates in which those advances add many millions of dollars to the net revenues of the companies which have made them.

Remember that those advances, if maintained, add, upon a 5 per cent basis, to the value of the railway twenty times the amount of the annual advance. I can say to you conservatively that the right to make the advances drawn in question by cases now pending before the Commission means more money than would be required to construct and equip every railroad in New England.

There is nothing small about the sum total involved in the advance in rates as thus stated. And at the Union League dinner at Chicago he makes this still more significant statement:

Not only is the railway itself the greatest monopoly by far, but it is the mother of countless monopolies. It is well understood that an advantage in the railway rate means life to one competitor and death to the other, and the advantage is not of necessity from the payment of the rebate. The boast of the Standard Oil Company to-day is that it takes no rebates. It does what is better than take rebates—it makes the schedule.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMAR. Certainly.

Mr. SIBLEY. I would like to ask, if I may understand his position, does not the gentleman think that this measure stops too far short of the real object sought to be attained, and that government ownership would be a better way of answering the popular demand than by attempting to control rates? Would it not be a more logical method, in his judgment, of procedure than to attempt to remedy the evils by a rate-fixing control?

Mr. LAMAR. I will say to the gentleman frankly, if I understand his question, I have formed no conclusions upon the question of government ownership of railroads. I mean by that that I have never arrived at that point in my consideration of this question where I thought I was in favor of government ownership. I know of no particular Democratic sentiment for it in my State. It has never been debated or discussed as a Democratic measure in Florida; but I will say to the gentleman that I believe if the American people had every railroad that has been built in America, over 200,000 miles, blotted out at one stroke of the pen to-day, to be restored to-morrow, and they were satisfied that neither this Congress nor any other Congress would ever pass this remedial legislation and they could never get it, then I believe the American people would vote that the Government construct its own railroads and operate them rather than that they be in the unfortunate position they have been in for many years and not be able under any circumstances to control the railroads in their extortionate rates. In an address made at Brooklyn by Mr. Justice William J. Gaynor, at a dinner of the local New England Society at the Nelson House, he used this language:

Some advocate the taking of the railroads by government. If the possibility of this experience we have had with freight rates had been foreseen, the Government would never have turned over these highways to corporations. But the resumption of them now would be a vast enterprise.

Mr. SIBLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman one more question. Does he believe that if that had been the case and the Government had originally constructed and operated these railroads, there would have been that magnificent development of our natural resources that is now witnessed on every hand and in every corner of our national domain?

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Chairman, that question is beyond my capacity to answer. I detract nothing from the great intelligence, the great energy, and the great enterprise of the great railroad men of this country. I have no hesitation in saying that as a body they are as good as any other body in this country, in Congress or out of it, but I do say that they have too great a power—the taxing power on transportation—to have it intrusted permanently with these great corporations, because those corporations operate their cars over public highways. They have their private property impressed with a public use. They have a property that the Government can take away from them to-morrow by condemning and paying for it a fair compensation.

The Government is only resuming a part of its fundamental rights when it passes this legislation to control the tolls of these great public highways. These railroad men have too great self-interest, so to speak, to trust them with the sole power, with the destiny, the money, and the earnings of the shippers of this country. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have great respect for any intelligent class of educated specialists. I have great respect for some man who has given some study to something and knows a great deal more about it than I do, but

I have no respect and no patience with any pretentious claim on behalf of railroad traffic managers that they have any great superiority in this matter of fixing freight rates over any intelligent body, an administrative body of skilled experts, like the present members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who decide a question only after hearings from both sides.

Now, listen to a little testimony before that Interstate Commerce Commission as to how these traffic manager experts fix rates. Why, you would imagine from the eulogies passed upon them by railway interests that there is great difficulty about their work, that it is something mysterious which the ordinary man can not understand or do. Here is Interstate Commerce Commissioner Prouty's testimony before a committee of Congress on that point:

As nearly as I can understand the claim of my railroad friends upon this branch of the case, it is this: The making of a railway tariff requires a peculiar mental quality. This quality is only possessed by an occasional specimen of the human species. The entire supply has already been taken up by the railways at extremely high figures, and hence the Government could not if it would and would not if it could procure that form of genius which is necessary to make or revise a rate schedule.

Nothing could be more absurd than the claim of the railways in this respect. We have in the past frequently interrogated the best of these traffic experts as to the methods by which they proceed. Not long ago one of them, when pressed with the consequences of the various answers he had given, stated that a traffic man made rates largely as the honey bee forms its cell, by a sort of instinct. Upon another occasion a traffic official who now occupies one of the most responsible positions of that kind in the country, after being questioned by the various members of the Commission as to how he arrived at a reasonable rate, said: "To tell the truth, gentlemen, we get all we can." That gentleman told the exact truth. The traffic official is paid to get all he can.

"Expertness" in railroad rate making is a "fake."

It is an invention to gull and hoodwink the people.

The most of it consists in—

(1) Put on all the rate in price that the traffic will bear.

(2) Cut the throat of your railroad competitor for business.

(3) By all means combine with rival railroads for "community of interest," and extinguish competition.

These simple rules of robbery constitute the great rate-making ability of railway traffic managers.

In conclusion, let me say that the opinions of one man or any one set of men, however intelligent they may be, will long influence from eighty-five to one hundred million of intelligent people against their own self-interest. Put it upon that ground, if upon no other, and the people of this country, in their State governments and in this nation, are determined that the people shall rule this country, control its Executive, control its judges, and control its legislators, free from corporate dictation and from corporate interference. I say, godspeed the capital of this country and godspeed to the railroad men, and may all their bona fide financial ventures prove profitable. We have a State, sir, that, in my opinion, is as conservative as any State in the Union. We have a State made up of northern and southern people, and a great deal of northern capital has been used in the State of Florida developing it, and I do not think the people of my district would tolerate my position upon this floor were I to make any general tirade against wealth or its acquirement or any general tirade against a man because he is rich and for no other reason, or against railroads merely as railroads. The people in my district in Florida, as in the whole State, are progressive citizens, up to the times, in my opinion, full of energy, and invite capital from all sections of this country into their borders for investment. I claim that the democracy of Florida is as conservative as the Republicanism of any other State. I claim that our Democracy is as loyal and true to the interests of all the people of this Government, rich and poor alike, as the Democracy of any other State.

Mr. SIBLEY. I do not wish to trespass on the time of the gentleman, but in the opening of his remarks he spoke of the rate on oranges from Florida to New York. The rate on oranges from California, as stated the other day, has been reduced to 80 cents, and to London or Liverpool to $1 a box, including the fast schedules and icing charges. What I would like to ask him is, if it does not strike him that it is unfair that for less than one-third of the distance the fruits of Florida should be charged perhaps from 50 to 60 per cent of the rate from California, where they must cross three ranges of mountains? And if that be the case, does it not follow that if we can pass this bill, compelling the oranges from California to stay there, the orange growers of Florida are going to have a better opportunity to market their products?

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Chairman, that may or may not be so. Certainly it is not any self-interest that dictates my opinion upon this bill. If the terms of this bill——

Mr. HINSHAW. In reference to the question asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], in view of the discriminations that exist under the present system, I would like to ask the gentleman from Florida if he does not believe a commission such as is constituted by this bill could do equally as well as the railroads do at the present time?

Mr. LAMAR. I have just read from the testimony of Mr. Prouty that traffic officials know no more about this matter than any other well-educated, intelligent man who has devoted any given time to study of it, and that one of them was complacent enough to say that he evolved his knowledge of rate making out of his inner consciousness. Another said, in effect, that he grabbed everything in sight. Now, between the two you read the truth. But one of the supreme reasons why I desire to see this legislation pass, and, while it is being passed, pass a bill remedial in all features and against all well-known and often-confessed abuses, is to take the railways out of the politics of this country. Let the railroad individuals, if they choose, urge their individual views. But it would seem there has grown up in this country—and there can be no doubt about it—an interference in public affairs and domination of public affairs, and a contest against public officials, springing out of the solidified power of corporate strength. It is against that that I speak. It is against that threat that I inveigh. It is to put the railroads upon a business basis in this country and make them business affairs, and compel them to let politics alone, that I desire to see this great question lifted out of the realm of discussion and put high and dry and secure from further agitation. That, sir, in my opinion will be as great an advantage to the country at large as will the passage of this bill to the shippers everywhere. I do not hesitate to say, and the newspapers of the country are full of it, and the people are conscious of it everywhere, that nearly all the political corruption in this country—municipal corruption, county corruption, State and national corruption—grows out of the interference of public service corporations in the politics of this country and with governmental agencies. It is too patent; it is too apparent. The passage by this Congress of a bill containing full remedial legislation against all railway abuses will largely take railroads and railroad interests out of active political interference with public legislation. [Loud applause.]

Railroad Rate Bill.

SPEECH

OF

HON. FRANKLIN E. BROOKS,

OF COLORADO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 8, 1906,

On the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Availing myself of the rules of this House and the opportunity thereby afforded, I desire, without consuming the time of the committee on the floor, to briefly set forth and make a part of the RECORD the reasons which are controlling with me on the question now before us. I shall support and vote for this measure and do so cordially, though not without some very grave apprehensions and misgivings.

After so much has been said on both sides of the pending question it would be idle for me to go into an elaborate discussion of the technical features of the controversy, even were I competent to do so. I prefer to set forth the reasons which govern my action broadly and on general principles, without especial attention to details and without attempting to predict the exact operation of the various phases of the measure.

At the outset let me say that I fully appreciate the magnitude of the interests involved. The forces of transportation, allied and interwoven as they are, constitute to-day the most stupendous fact in our industrial commonwealth. They have reached a point of development which is the amazement of the world. They have accomplished the apparently impossible, and in their own growth and expansion have contributed more than any other single cause to the growth and development of our industrial prosperity. From the time when Crassus controlled the grain transports of the Roman Empire until to-day, it has been true that he who controlled the methods of transportation of a nation controlled to an appalling extent its destinies, and the American railway system is the most striking example of that fact.

I appreciate what the disturbing of the immense sums invested in these interests would mean. I appreciate the danger of tampering with an established order which has been, in its broader features and its main outlines, strikingly efficient and beneficial. It is beyond question, in my judgment, that the ability to fix rates as the laws of trade and as the conditions of industrial growth have required, has hitherto been a most important and beneficial factor in the growth of large areas of our country. No portion of the country has been benefited more from this growth of our transcontinental railways than has the West, and I represent a Western State. I do not question for a moment that the opening up and the development of that section, and the changing of the trans-Mississippi country from a grazing to a farming section, with highly intensified forms of agriculture, has been due almost primarily to the power to fix differentials and to the much-abused long and short haul.

The railroads have also doubtless done much, in establishing interior basing points, to decentralize the wealth and industries of our country and to encourage a symmetrical growth with wide-spread prosperity. The examples of these facts have been too frequent and fully cited during this debate to warrant a repetition on my part of specific instances.

I quite agree, too, in particular, with what has been said with reference to governmental ownership of railways and to the effect of the rate-making systems of France and Australia. I do not think it can safely be controverted that our own system is far preferable for the investor, the shipper, and the country at large, to any of those mentioned, but it seems to me that all this is, to a degree, begging the question. Just as evident as are the beneficent features in the American railway system is the fact that abuses have grown up in it, with it, and, to some extent, as a part of it. The tremendous power which the railway systems have acquired has reached a point where they stifle and eliminate competition and to-day, to a degree inconsistent with the continued safety of the business world, dominate our industrial system. No one pretends to deny that by the device of private car lines certain shippers have been able to obtain unfair and prohibitive advantage against their competitors. More than this, they have been able to exact from the consuming public unfair and sometimes extortionate rates, because of this crushing out of competition that the railway abuses have made possible. No one seriously denies that by the use of terminal lines, swtching charges, and similar devices unfair advantages have been obtained by other shippers. Examples of these facts also have been too frequent. Feeding on favors such as these, favored corporations have grown, expanded, and reached towering heights, until they have overshadowed and overwhelmed their fellows, and the greatest trusts of to-day stand forth as the shining examples of what the perversion of the power of the railways and the abuse of their facilities can do when manipulated by unscrupulous and powerful hands (although when wisely applied they are vastly beneficent to whole areas).

With the power of $11,000,000,000 centered in a relatively small number of hands, with the tremendous influence that the control of transportation has given them, railway managers would be more than human if they did not sometimes err and if some evils had not crept in. This power is too great to be intrusted to individual hands without some guiding and controlling force to serve as a check and a restraint. I thoroughly believe that these evils are the excrescence and the incident and not the essential factor of our American railway system to-day. I believe that they should be corrected and remedied, and it seems to me that the pending measure will do something to bring about this result. I do not believe it will stifle individual initiative or that it will take the control of the roads from the hands of their owners. I do not suppose that it is perfect. I have yet to see the perfect work of human hands, but its passage does not put it beyond the power of correction. It would be a strange argument to advance any opposition to the enactment of remedial legislation designed to correct flagrant and dangerous abuses to say that the legislation itself might not be the best possible remedy and, therefore, no remedy should be applied. Time will demonstrate wherein this measure may be improved; but if no remedy is invoked, time will also shortly demonstrate that some of those who are now suffering from the evils complained of are beyond help, and some of the abuses will be far more difficult of correction as time goes on. Most of all do I dissent from the proposition that the bill is a step in the direction of State ownership. Indeed, I believe it is just the contrary, and this is one of the weighty reasons because of which I shall give it my support. If anything will bring about Government ownership of railways in this country, it is the continued and uncorrected abuses that the people suffer from; it is a disposition on the part of managers not to give heed to the honest and proper demands of the public and a want of any regulating and supervisory power. The cry of socialism has no terrors in this connection, but I fear, and believe that there is reason for the fear, that if some step similar to this be not soon taken then an outraged public, goaded to excesses, will adopt courses and initiate policies which will restrict individual initiative, will take the control of the railroads from their owners, will be subversive of private development, and will be the beginning of State ownership.

The new Commission gives very little, if any, power not exercised by the old Interstate Commerce Commission during the first few years of its existence, and the functions which the Commission formerly exercised in no way hindered or obstructed the development of our great railway companies. It distinctly does not give the right of initiative to the Commission, and it seems to me that not enough has been made of this point in the debates.

It is a narrow distinction, perhaps, but it is to me clear-cut and well-defined. It is, moreover, a most important distinction. It is for the roads themselves to say whether or not they shall expose themselves to an attack which a fair-minded, intelligent Commission, acting without fear or favor, would sustain. So long as they do this they need have no fear of the Commission, and it seems to me that a few decisions by the Commission will have a most positive and salutary effect in restraining further abuses, and in guiding both the shipping and transportation public into paths of fairness and rectitude. That any drastic, far-reaching system of rate overhauling will be initiated by the Commission is too remote to be considered. The stupendousness of the task itself appalls the human imagination. It is not the result under some remote and improbable conditions which we should consider in determining our action, but what is the rational, probable, and necessary general scope and effect of the course we propose taking. I thoroughly believe that the effect will be beneficial both to the shipper and to the roads.

There is a vast difference between the function intrusted to the Commission provided for by this bill, with the supervisory and regulative power of the courts always ready to be invoked to prevent excess, and the stifling, paralyzing, retrogressive influence of the French rate-making commission. If I thought that the result of the pending measure would be to inaugurate a system in any way approximating that commission, nothing would induce me to lend it my support. It is important, however, that we recognize the fact that evils exist and it is weak and unworthy of us not to make an honest and fair-minded attempt to remedy those evils simply because they are difficult of correction. These evils will not diminish because we shut our eyes to them. They will be no more easy to meet next week or next year, and the sooner the problem is honestly solved the less injury will be inflicted.

We have here a simple bill, reasonably clear in its terms, specific in its operation, the execution of which is to be committed to a body of trained, expert men who, without doubt, will be selected with great care from those most competent in the country to perform such duties. There is no warrant, in fact, for the belief that they will be otherwise than careful, prudent, and conservative in their conduct. I have too much faith in the integrity and adaptability of the American people to believe that this Commission will not meet the situation developed by this legislation properly and fairly for all interests concerned. The steadying effect of great power continued for a long period, splendidly evidenced in our higher Federal courts, will certainly bring about similar results with such a Commission, and I do not fear unfortunate results from its operation.

The question of constitutionality of the act I am willing to intrust to the thorough study and careful attention of the trained legal minds who have devoted so much attention to it, knowing always that their conclusions are subject to review and to judicious determination if there are any errors.

There are other reasons which to those of us on this side of the Chamber should appeal with great force. Our leaders have made this measure a party issue. We have gone before the country pledged to its enactment. The President, with the tremendous force of his moral convictions, with the intense earnestness of his nature, and with an unquestioned and unquestionable desire to work out the highest good of the people, has urged in the strongest manner possible his own reasons for this action. I am very glad to say that to me these commitments have great weight, and I am willing to resolve whatever doubt I may have with regard to the present expediency of this legislation in favor of it, because of this support that has been given it.

In a question such as this I think we may do well to follow with confidence the lead of the President, who, more than any man in recent times, stands for the needs of the common people and the fulfillment of their just, fair, and proper desires.

Indeed, I believe that none of the distinguished services that our present President has rendered to the people, when seen in perspective, will appear more striking and will have a more lasting and beneficial result than his action in crystallizing and clarifying public sentiment in this matter. We have talked railway rates in a desultory way for a good many years. There has been a keen consciousness that something was wrong; but there has been a vague, uncertain, unclarified attitude of the public mind with reference thereto. It has remained for Mr. Roosevelt, with his strong, direct, positive action, with his clear apprehension of the wrong and his common-sense view of a practicable and available remedy, to focus the public thought and transform what was hitherto a grumble of discontent into a strong, intelligent demand for prompt remedial action. I am glad, therefore, to lend whatever support I can to his efforts in this behalf.

Let me repeat, that in my view there is involved in this position nothing antagonistic to vested interests, nothing revolutionary, nothing subversive of our established industrial system, nothing really prejudicial to the interests of the railway companies themselves, and nothing which we as Representatives, having in mind the needs and requirements of the people, should not willingly accept. In so doing I know that I am voicing the strong public sentiment of the people whom I represent. I know that in so doing I am taking the course that they almost universally approve, and I believe that, in its essence, their judgment is sound and their views correct.

The Statehood Bill.

SPEECH

OF

HON. RICHARD BARTHOLDT,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 25, 1906,

On the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. BARTHOLDT said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I voted for the rule and shall vote for the bill. In determining my course I permitted the more important questions involved in the statehood proposition to overcome my objections to what must be regarded, in comparison with the main issue, as a minor detail. But I would be unfaithful to my convictions and unmindful of the principles I have cherished all my life if I failed to enter my emphatic protest against the provision which puts Indian Territory under the ban of prohibition. To my mind prohibition is slavery. It is subversive of recognized individual rights, and therefore undemocratic and un-American. Indeed, the question may be fairly asked, Which is the more objectionable, an arrangement which places a man's person under another man's control, or a device by which the exercise of inalienable individual rights is prevented by State authority? The right to eat and drink what you please is not one of those natural rights which the individual is called upon to surrender on becoming a member of civilized society, because its exercise involves neither a moral wrong nor an injury to his neighbor, and this is the reason why those who are ever bent on interfering with the personal habits of their neighbors have never dared to advocate laws prohibiting these habits directly or to deny their rightful exercise. They try to accomplish their purpose by indirection. Therefore prohibition means nothing more and nothing less than to prevent citizens from exercising a privilege which in itself is both legal and moral, and must hence be regarded as an undeniable and inalienable human right. I hold this to be a violation of every sound American doctrine of government and am certain that this House or Congress would never sanction it as an independent proposition.

It is needless to repeat here that prohibition never prohibits. Wherever it has been tried practical experience has demonstrated it to be a lamentable failure. It is because you can not correct human habits and change human nature by legislation, because you can not by invoking the physical power of the State do what education and refinement alone can accomplish. Take the Indian Territory for an example. The excesses committed there, so far as they are traceable to the excessive use of intoxicants, were a direct result of prohibition, because it renders the use of the light and healthful beverages, such as wine and beer, impossible and induces people clandestinely to procure the strong drinks that can easily be concealed. This is the case wherever prohibition is in vogue. It proves conclusively that prohibition does not mean temperance. Instead of promoting the cause of temperance it invites and encourages intemperance and excesses. I believe in temperance, Mr. Chairman, and those who have known me here for thirteen years know that I live up to that belief. Moreover, I sympathize with any movement which has the promotion of temperate habits for its object and with all good people who honestly strive to uphold the cause of moderation. But prohibition and prohibitionists do not belong in that category. They may mean well, but the movement long ago proved abortive and the people engaged in it are misled. Their remedy is wrong and vicious in principle and has proved ineffective in practice.

A little more than half a century has passed since the first prohibition law, the so-called "Maine law," was enacted. During this period prohibition has been introduced in a number of States—in some as a general measure, in some in the form of local option only. In some States the prohibition laws were, after a few years' trial, repealed, and in others it was attempted to prevent the sale of intoxicating beverages, or at least to reduce it to a minimum by high license.

And what is the result of all this legislation? Everyone knows, except those who do not want to know, that all legislative measures of a prohibitive character failed most disastrously in the very object which they had in view, namely, in preventing the use of intoxicating beverages. Invariably the result of prohibition was an increase in the use of ardent spirits and a decrease in the use of lighter drinks, especially beer, the mildest and most harmless of all alcoholic beverages. Prohibition created the most profitable fields for the sale of alcohol under the name of patent medicines, or bitters, or essences. Recent revelations have shown that some of them are stronger than whisky; the drugs which they contain render their indiscriminate use much more dangerous to health than plain whisky. Is it possible to believe that those who use them do not know that they drink alcohol?

Almost simultaneously with the establishment of prohibition came the establishment of the "speak easy," the "blind pig," the "blind tiger," and similar institutions with similar euphonious names; a new industry, that of the "boot legger," made its appearance; the druggist became a lawbreaker, the physician and his patients became hypocrites—the latter feigned disease and the former feigned belief and prescribed—public officials became corrupt, and the contempt in which the liquor laws were held extended to the law generally.

Bribery and blackmail became common, public and private morals suffered, and the self-esteem of the citizens sank.

In the census year 1890 the number of prison inmates in the United States was 82,290, or 1,315 for each 1,000,000 of inhabitants, but in Kansas the rate was 1,351 for each 1,000,000 of population. In Maine the rate was only 774, but in view of the fact that the rate in Minnesota was 619, in Wisconsin 663, Nebraska 619, there is nothing for Maine to pride herself on.

Moreover, all the prohibition States except Vermont showed in 1890 a decided increase in the number of prisoners over 1880. Massachusetts, which greatly limits the number of saloons, shows 2,335 prisoners for every 1,000,000 of inhabitants, almost twice the average.

But that is not all. If the following figures show anything, they show that prohibition has a tendency to retard the growth and development of States. The population of the United States in 1890 was 62,622,250; in 1900 it was 76,303,387, a gain of 21.80 per cent. The population of the prohibition States was as follows:

State.	1890.	1900.	Increase.
			Per cent.
Maine	661,086	694,466	5.05
New Hampshire	376,530	411,588	9.29
Vermont	332,422	343,641	3.37
Iowa	1,911,896	2,231,853	16.73
Kansas	1,427,096	1,470,495	4.00
North Dakota	182,719	319,146	75.00
South Dakota	382,808	401,570	22.00

With the exception of the Dakotas, the prohibition States remained far behind the average in increase of population. South Dakota shows 1 per cent above the average, but it ceased to be a prohibition State in 1896, and the great increase of the population of North Dakota remained far behind its increase in the previous decade, when it was 278 per cent.

Prohibition was everywhere followed by a slower growth of population. In Iowa the increase between 1870 and 1880 was 36 per cent; in the following decade it sank to 17.66, and then to 16.73. The population of Kansas increased 173 per cent between 1870 and 1880, only 43 per cent between 1880 and 1890, and only 4 per cent between 1890 and 1900.

Reversely, the influence of prohibition on the growth of population is shown in Rhode Island. Her population increased 18 per cent between 1850 and 1860. In 1863 prohibition was abolished, and the following census showed an increase of 25 per cent.

During the same periods the population of the nonprohibition New England States had a healthy growth above the average.

It is a remarkable fact that of the three Commonwealths of the Union which ever suffered a decrease of population two were prohibition States, namely, Maine and New Hampshire, and they suffered their loss during an intense prohibition agitation between 1860 and 1870. The third State—Nevada—is a mining State, with an insignificant, naturally shifting, and fluctuating population.

To countenance these conditions and to assist their growth and duration by the passage of the Hepburn-Dolliver bill would, in my humble opinion, be a grave error.

I am not quite clear in my mind which kind of would-be reformers are the more dangerous, those who blindly stick to a theory or dogma without studying the effect of its application in practical life, or those who look only upon the surface of the phenomena of practical life without forming any theory as to their cause and effect. Be this as it may, the prohibitionists, who belong to the former class, seem to act upon the principle that the whole country may "go to the dickens" if only their dogma is saved.

How it is possible, in view of the almost unanimous testimony of post commandants and officers of the United States Army to the injurious and demoralizing effects of the abolition of the canteen, to still object to its reestablishment passes my comprehension. Vile resorts have grown up in the neighborhood of the posts like mushrooms, where the vilest liquors are served to the soldier, who otherwise would be content with the glass of beer which he got in the canteen. He associates in these resorts with the most degraded class of women, and as a consequence desertions, courts-martial, and loathsome diseases have fearfully increased, discipline is weakened, and the physical and moral health of the soldier ruined. The testimony is collected in a volume of over 500 pages in House Document No. 252, entitled "The Sale of Beer and Light Wines in Post Exchanges. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War," etc.

Only a short time ago, J. H. Burton, Inspector-General of the Army, reported 6,533 desertions from the Army in that last fiscal year—that is to say, one out of every nine soldiers deserted. No army in the world equals that. Among the principal causes he states: "No beer to be had in the post exchanges."

In the last report of the Surgeon-General of the Army I find, in Table A, a comparison between the prevalence of certain diseases in the American and the foreign armies. In the American Army there are 25.50 cases of acute alcoholism and delirium tremens in every 1,000 cases of sickness; in the Prussian army there are 0.9; in the Bavarian, 0.19. That is to say, that there is in the American Army more than a hundred and fifty times as much alcoholism as in the German. Yet in all German barracks are canteens, and in Bavaria, the beer country of the world, beer forms a part of the daily diet of everybody, the soldiers included.

In the Philippine Islands the condition is even worse, the rate of alcoholism among our soldiers being 37.50.

In a letter to Major Seaman, Army surgeon, a prominent officer, stationed at Peking in 1901, expressed himself very pointedly and satirically on the subject, as follows:

> The Woman's Christian Temperance Union would have no fault to find with the post here. The men go outside and get drunk on sam shui in town and go to sleep in back yards or other worse places, but the sanctity of the Government reservation is maintained. The Germans have a "bier halle" on the wall at Hartaman gate. The Japanese have their canteen. The British have one in their grounds, and bring their beer to their tables. The French soldier has his little bottle of wine at dinner. We alone are virtuous. We are the advocates of reform. We are the great hypocritical hippodrome—none like we.

As to the condition on which it is proposed to admit Oklahoma and the Indian Territory into statehood, it is seriously to be considered whether such a proceeding would not be a violation of the principle underlying our form of Government. True, there are precedents. Kansas was admitted upon the condition that it would not permit slavery and Utah was compelled to give up polygamy. The slavery question, however, was a question of life and death to the Union, and the modern civilized world is unanimous in the condemnation of polygamy. The miserable and petty question of prohibition can not be compared in importance with the slavery and marriage question. Besides, the condition can not be enforced. The law provides for the admision of States, but not for their expulsion. If, after the admission of a new State, its citizens should determine to use their right of legislating for themselves in a sphere which properly belongs to the State, and should abolish prohibition, who can prevent them?

Aside from the legal and constitutional reasons for not insisting on prohibition, there are the well-known practical reasons against it. Prohibition prevails in Indian Territory now, but even the strong arm of the Federal Government is unable to entirely suppress the illegal sale of liquor, and most certainly it can not prevent the use of substitutes, some of which are quite nasty and far more injurious than whisky. A correspondent of a St. Louis paper recently wrote from Tulsa, Ind. T., among other things, as follows:

> To satisfy a thirst for a thing that can not be had men that are addicted to the use of alcohol will go to any extreme. Many have lost their lives in trying to quench their thirst. Some have been shot down by United States marshals, while others have resorted to patent medicines, lemon extract, red ink, extract of ginger, or any compound that had for its base alcohol. Hardly a week passes without some poor man, and occasionally a woman, leaving the world by one of these routes. Patent medicines are good sellers, especially if they are part whisky. Varnish, where corn alcohol is used, is a favorite drink, especially among the painters, the body of it being first allowed to precipitate.

Varnish; that is the thing! Give civilization an outside coat of varnish by prohibition, and make people drink the stuff so as to give it also an inside coat. It is all sham, this sumptuary legislation, anyway, and the best thing which Congress could do would be to wash its hands of it and not sacrifice its dignity to the injudicious schemes of theorists, who utterly refuse to gain a knowledge of life from its practical side.

Whether a man will use alcoholic beverages or not is solely a matter of his individual concern, and any interference by legislation is an interference with his personal liberty. This it would be even if prohibition would prohibit, which it does not. Men have used alcoholic stimulants during past centuries and will use them for many centuries to come. Perhaps it would be wise to influence their choice in a reasonable and discreet manner, and the only proper legislation for that purpose not below the dignity of our National Legislature would be fiscal legislation that would have a tendency to cause a substitution of the milder drinks, such as wine and beer, for the strong ardent spirits. The encouragement of wine culture might prove a moral and economic blessing to some parts of our country; a wise discrimination in fiscal legislation between ardent liquors and fermented malt beverages may popularize the latter and promote real temperance. But nothing is more dangerous than coercion or repression by the force of law in matters which, according to the general prevailing sentiment, belong to the domain of the individual will. We live in a democratic country and in a democratic age. The individual will demands not a limitation, but rather an extension of its sphere, and the spirit of liberty rebels against the application of a theory which makes everybody a judge of what is good for a man except that man himself.

In the short time allotted to me it is impossible to go more fully into this subject, but let me say just a word in regard to the pending bill. If the provision to which I have called attention became a law, the white citizens of Indian Territory, as well as the Indians, would for the next twenty-one years be denied the opportunity of securing even the lightest kind of beverage for their family tables. Their personal rights would be curtailed to this intolerable extent by a mandate of Congress. Is there a single man within the sound of my voice who does not see the absurdity of such a proposition? While granting them the independence and sovereignty of statehood with one hand, are we not putting the chains of slavery around their necks with the other? Is this not erecting the gallows alongside of the liberty we feign to grant them? Surely it would be a repetition of the amusing demonstration in 1848 of which history tells us, when the unsophisticated peasant subjects of the Grand Duke of Hesse shouted: "Long live the Republic! Long live the Grand Duke!" in the same breath. If the good people of Indian Territory should fail to rebel against this tyrannical attempt on the part of Congress to dictate to them in a matter which is and should be their own affair, then I am greatly mistaken in their character and manhood. It was Abraham Lincoln who said, "You can not create a State half slave and half free," and if ever an American Congress or the people themselves should so far forget American traditions as to ignore the injunction handed down to us in these truthful words, then the Supreme Court of the United States will no doubt give them renewed force and effect. [Loud applause.]

Philippine Tariff.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, January 12, 1906,

On the bill (H. R. 3) to amend an act entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved March 8, 1902.

Mr. LONGWORTH said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I submit the following letters as a part of my remarks delivered on Friday, January 12, 1906:

THE ANTI-IMPERIALIST LEAGUE,
20 Central Street, Boston, January 13, 1906.

Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH.

DEAR SIR: Your speech yesterday has given great gratification to those who have always opposed the annexation of the Philippine Islands. I trust the inclosed measure, which has been introduced into the House in two or three forms, as well as in the Senate by Mr. CRANE, may have your support, as no date is suggested for the independence of the islands, the intention of the resolution being to obviate the objection made to our avoidance of the responsibility supposed to be assumed in the matter should we abandon the archipelago to the possible greed of other nations. I wonder if you will allow me to suggest that, in spite of the childlikeness which appears in many of the Filipinos whom you have met, there are a good many men of solid character, intelligence, and education among them who perhaps had to be rather sought out by members of the Congressional party seeming to be under the guidance of the Secretary, who has rather committed himself to stifling all discussion of the subject. We know and have been in more or less connection with a very large number of such persons, and although undoubtedly there might be ups and downs and periods of chaos, the elements exist which would in a very little while come into control and give the Filipinos a satisfactory and reasonably orderly government. The contention can hardly be disputed, as Mr. John Fiske, the historian, has asserted, that no nation ever succeeded in self-government unless by its own independent evolution, nor had even been led on to it under any foreign tutelage whatever.

Pardon the intrusion to the immense interest which we have in the subject and the very sincere sympathy and gratitude we feel for the advanced position you have taken.

I am, your obedient servant,

ERVING WINSLOW, Secretary.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 16, 1906.

ERVING WINSLOW, Esq.,
Secretary the Anti-Imperialist League,
No. 20 Central Street, Boston, Mass.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 13th instant is at hand and contents carefully noted.

You state that my recent speech on the Philippine tariff bill has "given great gratification to those who have always opposed the annexation of the Philippine Islands," and ask my support for the resolution introduced into the Senate by Mr. CRANE, which provides, in effect, that the President shall be requested to open negotiations with other nations to secure the neutralization of the Philippine Islands. I confess, most respectfully, that I fail to see in what respect my remarks may have pleased the members of the Anti-Imperialist League or in what respect I may have given grounds for anyone supposing that I would support this resolution.

I took particular pains to say that in my opinion to-day and for the life of the present generation, at least, the Filipino people are absolutely incapable of self-government, and stated the two characteristics of the Filipino people that render them, in my opinion, incapable, to wit, a lack of appreciation of the duty of the public officer to the people and their utter lack of a conception of the dignity of labor. I used this language: "Until the Filipino people shall have proved themselves capable of forming these two conceptions it would be, in my mind, nothing short of a national crime to turn the islands over to them, for it could do nothing else, even with all the safeguards of an international treaty of neutrality, but condemn them to almost immediate anarchy and bloodshed." In my opinion those Filipinos who argue that they are ready for immediate independence, provided this Government negotiate an international treaty of neutrality, convict themselves of incompetency to form a government by their own statement. They rest their whole cause on the statement that there are two classes in the Philippines—the directing class and the obeying class. These gentlemen, if they had their way, would form a government most obnoxious to those who believe in free institutions.

You state in your letter that there are a good many men of solid character, intelligence, and education among the Filipinos. I agree with you perfectly. I myself met many men whose friendship I would be proud to claim; scholars and men of ability and character who would be noted and respected men in any country, but from not one of them did I ever hear the statement that the Filipinos were ready for self-government or would be for years to come.

You say that Secretary Taft "has rather committed himself to stifling all discussion of the subject." The truth of that statement I deny absolutely. There was not a moment of our stay in the Philippine Islands that Secretary Taft and every member of his party were not glad to hear any statement that any Filipino chose to make; in fact, Secretary Taft at all times urged any Filipino who had any complaint to make against the government or any criticism of the acts of any public officers, or had views on any subject of interest to the Filipinos, to appear and state them. Day after day we were in session, morning and afternoon, in the ayuntamiento. The hearings were public and anyone who had anything to say was welcome. Your statement that Secretary Taft sought to stifle discussion is untrue, and is unfair to a man who has the interest of the Filipino people at heart far more than any member of the Anti-Imperialist League.

Permit me to say, in closing, that I wholly and absolutely disapprove of every step and every action taken by the Anti-Imperialist League from its inception, and that I wholly and absolutely approve of the policy of the Government of the United States toward the Filipinos since our occupation there. I am not in favor of holding the Philippines forever; I do not favor holding them longer than we are in honor bound to do. In my opinion we are in honor bound to hold them and to govern them until the Filipinos shall have proved themselves capable of self-government. I fear that will be a long time. I am sure that it will not come during the present generation of Filipinos. I fear that an intelligent public sentiment will only appear in generations yet unborn. I may be wrong. I hope I am. I hope that the present policy of the United States will bring about the substantial and needed changes in the condition and capacity of the people sooner than I believe it will, but in the meantime to do anything else than what we are now doing would be, in my opinion, a national crime.

I have the honor to be, very truly, yours,

NICHOLAS LONGWORTH.

THE ANTI-IMPERIALIST LEAGUE,
20 Central Street, Boston, January 15, 1906.

Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH.

DEAR SIR: Having the advantage to-day of reading the report of your speech in the RECORD, I see that the efforts of the translator of the Philippine memorial presented in the Marble Hall at Manila last August seem to you a subject of criticism. May I submit to you a fair translation of the first two paragraphs which you quoted in your speech?

"It is undeniable that in the Philippines there exists a sufficient number of what is called 'the ruling class,' a small part of which is at present in the government employ in all the branches of its administration, cooperating with it actively and effectively in its governmental labors.

"If the Philippine Archipelago has a governable mass, adapted to obedience, and a ruling class able to exert command, it has conditions for self-government. These, without counting incidental exceptions, are the two elements which determine the political capacity of a country—a body which knows how to govern, 'the ruling class;' and a body which knows how to obey, 'the popular mass.' The culture of the ruling class and that of the popular mass of the Filipinos, strictly and relatively, is harmoniously adjustable."

The sentence which you compare with Mark Twain's style, in a proper translation reads as follows:

"The fact that the Filipinos lack such immortal figures as those of Washington and Jefferson does not make them unfit for self-government. There are independent nations wonderfully civilized, established in a political liberty, without having nurtured citizens of such stature. Cuba and Panama, yesterday declared republics of the same North America, can not boast the memories of such great men."

If you and your colleagues approached the Filipino mind no more closely that by judgments formed upon a casual interpreter's conception, it may account for a certain lack of sympathy and comprehension. It may interest you to know that in many of the collegiate debates, for which we are constantly supplying material on the question of the retention of the Philippines, the decision in favor of abandonment of the islands has been given in consequence of the ability and quality of the testimony (properly translated) given at the Marble Hall. Had you placed yourself in contact with such men as Sandiko, Barretto, and Guerrero you would have found a large class of persons quite equal in capacity and intelligence with those who have taken service with the Government and superior to them, of course, in ideals of patriotism and the principles of liberty.

I am, your obedient servant,

ERVING WINSLOW, Secretary.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 18, 1906.

ERVING WINSLOW, Esq.,
Secretary the Anti-Imperialist League,
No. 20 Central Street, Boston, Mass.

DEAR SIR: Since writing the inclosed letter, bearing date of January 17, I have received your letter of the 15th and have carefully noted its contents.

I am not altogether surprised to note that since reading the report of my speech in the RECORD you see my views in a different light than you did from the somewhat meager report published in some of the newspapers.

You say in your letter "if you and your colleagues approached the Filipino mind no more closely that (than?) by judgments formed upon a casual interpreter's conception, it may account for a certain lack of sympathy and comprehension." You seem to forget that in addition to this printed memorial we listened to addresses from a number of gentlemen upon the subject therein contained. In fact, as I remember it, the session lasted not less than five hours. The statement was specifically made by these gentlemen that all their views and the views of those whom they assumed to represent were contained in this pamphlet. In fact, if my memory serves me right, they said that it was their creed.

I used in my remarks the exact words of the pamphlet for this reason. The translation of some portions of the pamphlet which you have submitted to me I have no doubt are correct, although I am not a student of Spanish, but the exact phraseology in which their arguments are clothed makes absolutely no difference in this case. Phrase the argument how you may, the very basis of their contention that the Filipinos are now in a condition to govern themselves is the fact that there exists among the Filipinos two separate and distinct classes—a small class competent to direct and a large class competent to obey. In other words, they advocate the proposition that the classes shall govern the masses. The fact that almost in the next breath they refer to Russia as a free state is significant of the kind of government that they would form if they had their way.

You further state: "It may interest you to know that in many of the collegiate debates, for which we are constantly supplying material on the question of the retention of the Philippines, the decision in favor of the abandonment of the islands has been given in consequence of the ability and quality of the testimony (properly translated) given at the Marble Hall." I have not had the privilege of listening to any of the "collegiate debates" referred to; but if any American, even though he be a college boy, has argued in favor of class government in a republic or has commended freedom as it exists in Russia I confess I am surprised.

The Philippine bill has just passed the House of Representatives.

It was passed by the votes of those who believe that this Government should do all it can to benefit the Filipinos materially and to uplift all classes, including what you style the "obeying class," mentally and morally. As one of those and as one who sincerely admires their many good qualities and does not condemn, but pities, their many bad ones, I say, and I say it with the deepest conviction, that to adopt any other policy than that which this Government is now pursuing toward the Philippine Islands would be a grave national blunder. To turn the islands over to the Filipinos to govern for themselves at this time would be a national crime.

I do not court any newspaper controversy with the Anti-Imperialist League, but, in view of your misapprehension of my position, and with the desire that it shall not further be misapprehended, I shall feel at liberty to make this correspondence public.

I have the honor to be, yours, with great respect,

NICHOLAS LONGWORTH.

The Statehood Bill.

REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY D. FLOOD,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, January 26, 1906,

On the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State Government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. FLOOD said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I am well aware that it is a futile waste of time to offer any objections to the passage of this bill. That matter was settled on yesterday when the resolution reported by the Committee on Rules was adopted. That transaction was among the most flagrant exhibitions of arbitrary and despotic power ever witnessed in the American Congress. The effect of that resolution was to enable the Republican majority in this House to force a vote upon the statehood bill at 3 o'clock to-day without further debate, motion, or amendment.

It is the cloture or gag-law proceeding in its most obnoxious form. It is an infamous proceeding to rush through an infamous measure. That measure is to admit by one bill four Territories as two States; to join together Oklahoma and the Indian Territory as one State, and Arizona and New Mexico as one State.

The proceeding is infamous, because it strikes down the right of debate and amendment in the American Congress, where the representatives of the people have the right, or ought to have the right, to discuss public measures affecting the interests of their constituents, and to offer amendments to such measures. It is an infamous measure, because it forcibly joins together as one State the two Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, whose people do not desire to be thus united, and who by dissimilarity of race, religion, language, customs, and civilizations ought not to be united—two populations that are totally unhomogenous. The people of New Mexico are of the Latin race, or of mixed Latin and Indian, while the great majority of the people of Arizona are Americans, of Anglo-Saxon descent.

I know, as I have said, that it is a waste of time to protest against this enormity. I take that back. It is a futile attempt, but it is not a waste of time. It can never be a waste of time to sound a note of warning against the action of an arrogant majority in trampling under foot the freedom of speech, the right of debate in this House; and by their action in forcing an alliance of these Territories against their will, and thereby trampling underfoot the great principle enunciated in the Declaration of Independence that "all just government rests upon the consent of the governed."

The American people are not indifferent spectators of what is transpiring in this House to-day. That it will meet with their approval, I can never believe. That the disregard with which the majority treat not only the right of debate on this floor, but the right of the people of the Territories to be heard as to the conditions upon which they shall assume statehood, will incur the frown of the American people, I verily believe. That this arrogant and insolent majority will be awakened from their dream of security by the thunders of the ballot box is a thing that I confidently expect to see.

Consider for a moment what it is that we do in passing this bill. We scout the idea that a people have a right to be heard in the formation of a government that shall regulate their political and domestic concerns.

There has been a labored effort to show that in numerous instances Territories have been invested with statehood upon political considerations and not in deference to the wishes of the people of the Territory. But I venture to say that no instance can be found where statehood was forced upon a Territory under such conditions of violent opposition and vehement protest as exist in Arizona. The incontestable fact before this House is that with almost absolute unanimity the people of Arizona—men, women, and children—are opposed to being united with New Mexico as a State. This fact is not gainsaid; it is not pretended to be controverted; it can not by any audacity of contradiction be denied. Two gentlemen, Republicans both, have stated on this floor that they voted two years ago for joining these Territories in one State, but since that time they have visited Arizona and discovered such a universal antipathy among the people to the jointure that they have changed their minds and will feel constrained to vote against the bill. The people of Arizona have sent to Congress protests against this jointure—this outrage, as they call it—from the press, from the pulpit, from the business houses, and actually from the schoolhouses. The idea of a political and domestic union with New Mexico is abhorrent to them. They are white-featured Americans—Anglo-Saxons. The people of New Mexico are darkhued Latins and a mixture of Latins and Indians. Mr. Chairman, the great dramatist in the tragedy of "Othello" describes Desdemona as wooed by the dusky Moor with tales of thrilling adventure that he poured into her ear. He told his story of battles, sieges, fortunes, of moving accidents by flood and field; and so won her assent to lay his head upon that breast whiter than snow, and smooth as monumental alabaster. But very different from that picture is this. Here the fair American maiden scorns an alliance with the dusky Mexican, and the latter is even indifferent to the charms of the fair scorner.

Mr. Chairman, I maintain that the people of these Territories have a right to have their wishes consulted in this matter of uniting them into one State. The Constitution of the United States provides (Art. IV, sec. 3) that no State "shall be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned." I contend that by a parity of reasoning no two Territories ought to be joined to make a State without the consent of the people of the respective Territories. The principle that underlies both propositions is the same, the fundamental principle that "all just government rests upon the consent of the governed."

Let me ask why should not Arizona be permitted, at the proper time, to enter the Union as a separate State, instead of being forced against her will in conjunction with New Mexico? She is not asking to be admitted now. She has on several occasions in the past knocked at the door of the Union, but on those occasions partisan politics declared that her case was not that of the invitation in scripture, "Knock, and it shall be opened unto you." But whenever she asks to come in, and fulfills the requisites of sufficient population, sufficient resources, and sufficient area, it will be the duty of Congress to admit her as a separate State, and not coerce her into an abhorrent alliance with a dissimilar and uncongenial people. She has now a population of 150,000, larger than that possessed by twenty States at the time of their admission into the Union. Her resources of agriculture are good and are rapidly improving year by year, while her mineral and mining resources are enormous. And as to area, she is more than three times the size of any State east of the Mississippi River. And yet this bill unites as one State this immense Territory with another Territory of equal if not greater dimensions. The two Territories of Arizona and New Mexico together form an area of such expanse that to simply give the figures that express its dimensions is to demonstrate the impropriety of admitting them as one State. They are together larger than the original thirteen States, leaving out North Carolina. The distance across them by a line diagonally connecting the extreme corners is greater than the distance from New York to Chicago; greater than the distance from the Virginia Capes to the Mississippi River. Think of that—greater than from the Atlantic Ocean to the Mississippi.

It has been said in the course of this debate that in addition to the barriers of race, religion, customs, and civilizations which separate these two Territories nature has interposed an almost impassable barrier of mountains, a spur of the Rocky Range.

Mr. Chairman, you and every Member of this body must have often noticed and admired the graphic and animating fresco by Leutze that adorns the wall as you go up the stairway that leads to the House gallery above. It is entitled "Westward Ho," and represents a caravan of pioneers journeying to the far West before the days of railroads. The adventurers have just attained the top of the Rocky Mountains and are gazing in rapture on the vision that opens to their view toward the setting sun. One is represented as standing on a rock that forms the highest pinnacle. If we may suppose this caravan to be crossing the spur of the Rockies that separates these two Territories, what would this man on the pinnacle behold? Looking back over the region through which he had journeyed, there would lay a land stretching far beyond the limit of human vision—for 500 miles to Oklahoma. Looking to the west, there would lay a land stretching an equal distance of 500 miles to where the Colorado River empties into the Gulf of California—practically to the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. Chairman, is it not an enormity to admit this immense area into the Union as a single State?

And yet, Mr. Chairman, great as this enormity is, how can we be surprised at it? Is it not the disregarding of an implied, if not the express, provision of the Constitution to join together two reluctant and unwilling people? But is it not being done by the same party that dismembered the State of Virginia and by a Cæsarian operation gave birth to the State of West Virginia, with a zigzag line of separation between what was once a homogeneous and happy State? The Republican party does not hesitate to divide an unwilling people into two States; it does not scruple to unite into one two dissimilar, uncongenial, and discordant peoples.

The Statehood Bill.

OF
HON. ROBERT W. BONYNGE,
OF COLORADO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 26, 1906,

On the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. BONYNGE said:

Under the rule adopted by the House general leave to print remarks on the statehood bill has been granted, and I desire to take advantage of that permission. While, generally speaking, I do not approve of the custom, I think it is fully justified in the present case. Debate in the House upon the bill under the rule governing its consideration was purely pro forma. The bill was not open to an amendment of any kind or description. The only purpose that could possibly be served by the debate was to enable Members to express their views upon the pending measure and to give their reasons for their action upon the bill. That purpose can be served equally well by printing the remarks in the RECORD, and I therefore have no hesitancy in availing myself in this case of the privilege granted.

I do so for the purpose of stating the grounds of my opposition to the bill. I shall content myself with a very plain and brief statement of my objections to the measure. It was a matter of deep regret to me that I found myself in opposition to a majority of the Members on the Republican side of the House. I took consolation, however, in the fact that in pursuing the course I did I was in accord with the oft-repeated platform utterances of the Republican party through its national conventions.

Oklahoma and Indian Territory are unquestionably entitled to immediate admission into the Union. If the question concerning those two Territories could have been separated under the rule, it would have been found that the House was unanimously in favor of the admission of Oklahoma and Indian Territory. There is no objection to the jointure of those two Territories. Indian Territory is not an organized Territory, and, furthermore, by the act creating Oklahoma it is expressly provided that portions of Indian Territory may from time to time be attached to Oklahoma. It is also well understood that a majority of the people of both Territories are in favor of the jointure of the two and their admission as one State.

The objection to the bill under consideration is to the jointure of Arizona and New Mexico without giving to the people of each Territory the right to express their wishes separately upon the proposition. Such action is contrary to the established custom which has prevailed from the foundation of the Government to the present time. No other action of this character has ever been taken.

Congress has the undoubted power to do what it will in regard to the government of Territories. Precedents have, however, been established which have great moral weight and force, if not the binding effect of a legal obligation. No Territory has ever been forced into the Union against the wish of its people. Territories have for many purposes been regarded as embryonic States. The autonomy of Territories has been as uniformly and as sacredly regarded as the autonomy of the States. In the case of Arizona, in addition to the force of precedents, we have the express and direct assurance given to the people of that Territory in the organic act creating it that the people of the Territory should be permitted to retain a Territorial government until such time as they were ready for statehood.

Arizona was originally a county of New Mexico, and was formed as a separate Territory by the act of February 24, 1863. In the organic act creating the Territory we find the following language:

Provided further, That said government shall be maintained and continued until such time as the people residing in said Territory shall, with the consent of Congress, form a State government, republican in form, as prescribed in the Constitution of the United States, and apply for and obtain admission into the Union as a State on an equal footing with the original States.

It was a direct and express promise and agreement made by the Congress of the United States to the people of Arizona that their Territorial government should be maintained until they were ready for admission into the Union as a separate State, and that promise has been in force and recognized for forty-three years. It may be said that this Congress can repeal that portion of the act. Certainly it can, but such action would be a violation of good faith to the people of Arizona. For forty-three years the people of that Territory have understood, by the language of that act, that they had the right to develop their own institutions and their own resources along such lines as they might determine upon, with the promise on the part of Congress that when they had reached a sufficient stage of development they would be admitted as a separate State of the Union. They have acted upon that promise and that agreement. It can not be violated now without doing a gross injustice to the people of the Territory.

They are not now asking for statehood. They simply ask that that guaranty and promise made to them and recognized for such a long period of time shall not be ruthlessly withdrawn and broken. Surely every consideration of fairness under all of these circumstances would prompt Congress, it seems to me, to permit them at least to vote upon the question whether or not they desire to have their Territory annexed to New Mexico, and to respect their wishes in the matter. The bill under consideration does not provide for such submission of the question to the people of Arizona and New Mexico separately gives them no separate voice in the matter whatever, and the rule under which the bill was considered prohibited the House from even offering or considering such an amendment to the bill.

Under those circumstances, and if no other objection existed to the bill, I should have felt compelled to vote against it.

There are other reasons, however, which have great weight with me. I deplore the fact that some evidence and some suggestions of sectionalism have unfortunately crept into the discussion of this measure. There is not, and never can be, any feeling of sectionalism between the people of the East and the West, or between any two sections of our common country. Such feeling between the East and the West is wholly without any sort of foundation. The people of those two great sections of the country are bound together by ties of interest, of friendship, and of kinship. The majority of the people of the West are of eastern extraction and education. We take pride in the growth and development of every State and every section of the country. We do not envy the wealth that we see many of the Eastern States accumulating, but rejoice in the fact that every portion of the country is prospering. We have contributed in no small degree to the general development of the country, and especially to the wealth of the Eastern States. We have cheerfully supported policies of government which in our judgment have helped to develop the great manufacturing industries of those prosperous Commonwealths. We know that in time under the same policies our own States and Territories will grow and develop. We do not charge the people of the East with antagonism to western interests, but we do feel that many of them have but little comprehension of the possibilities for the future greatness of the western portion of our country, particularly of that section which is generally known as "arid America."

We can not help recalling, when we hear the doleful prophecies about the future of the mountain region, that similar statements were made about each of our western acquisitions. The Louisiana Purchase, the acquisition of Oregon Territory, and the purchase of Alaska were each and all regarded by many of the ablest men, both in public and private life, at the time of such acquisitions as great blunders and mistakes. The prophets of misfortune of those days predicted that those sections of the country would never reach a stage of development that would justify the creation in such sections of new States to be admitted on an equality with the original States. The marvelous growth of the country west of the Mississippi River is now a matter of history. In the light of what has transpired we might reasonably expect the people of to-day to learn from the experience of the past. Some of our eastern friends do not seem to. They seem to be as totally ignorant about the possibilities of the Rocky Mountain section of the country to-day as were their forefathers of a generation or two ago. I will not, in this connection, enumerate the resources of New Mexico and Arizona. They have been most ably presented by others in the course of the limited debate on the bill. In my judgment, there is unquestionably assured to each of those Territories a future that will in time, if not at present, entitle them to admission as separate States of the Union.

Population is not and never has been the sole criterion by which the right of Territories to admission to the Union has been determined. Even if it were so, each of these Territories—New Mexico and Arizona—have a greater population to-day than had many of the populous States of the Union at the time of their admission, and they each have to-day a greater population than some of the present States of the Union. It is possibly true that some of the Western States may have been admitted before they were ready for admission, but there is not one of them that will not in the future amply justify the faith and the confidence that was placed in them. Every one of them will demonstrate its right to separate statehood and there will be no star on the flag of which any portion of the country need ever be ashamed. They may not all become populous States, but we never can expect to have the population of the States even approximately equal. It is not the theory upon which States are formed. In the case of New Mexico and Arizona, every consideration of justice prompts me to vote against their jointure except by the consent of a majority of the people of each Territory. I certainly will not, by my vote, cast any discredit upon that great and growing section of the country, of which my State and city is the commercial center.

If these Territories are not now ready for admission, they can and are ready to wait until such time as the Congress believes them to be entitled to come into the Union as separate States. Arizona is not asking for admission at the present time, and that fact must not be overlooked. It simply asks the right, as do also many people of New Mexico, to express their wish upon this important question at the polls. Home rule is a cardinal principle of our Government. Congress established Arizona as a separate Territory and gave it, as I have shown, the guaranty that that Government should be maintained until a State government was formed. It is unfair, after permitting them for forty-three years to enjoy this guaranty, to take it away without their consent. Give the people of Arizona and of each of these Territories an opportunity to vote upon the proposition at the polls. That is the American way of settling all disputed questions. It is fair; it is just.

Because it is denied to them and for the reasons I have stated, I am opposed to the passage of the bill in its present form.

Railroad Rate Bill.

OF
HON. SAMUEL W. SMITH,
OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 7, 1906,

On the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I intend to vote for this bill. The paramount question is, What ought to be done; what can be done; what is best for all concerned? And in this connection we ought to consider the interests of the people and of the railroads with equal fairness and justice, for we all must admit that the railroads have proved a powerful agency in the development of this country, and to pass any legislation that would not carefully safeguard the affairs of all would be unwise and fraught with danger.

I believe the bill ought to be amended in several particulars. It is to be regretted that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce feels that it would jeopardize the final passage of the bill to permit any amendments.

A similar bill was passed by the House in the closing hours of the last Congress. It has been frequently asserted that it did not become a law because it had not received sufficient consideration.

During the months which have intervened between the last Congress and the present time each of us has been receiving an unusual amount of reading matter bearing upon all phases of this subject, and as a result we have been reading more or less, thinking, and discussing this proposition with the sole end in view of trying to formulate some legislation that would meet the exigencies of the case, and for several days we have been entertained with forcible and able arguments, a debate the like of which has not been had in this body for many years. What has all this been for, except to better inform ourselves and aid the committee in perfecting this very important legislation?

I appreciate the great difficulty of formulating a bill that would meet the wishes of all and I clearly understand that all legislation is, to a greater or less extent, the result of compromise.

There seems to be a divided opinion upon the part of the members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee as to whether or not the bill is broad enough so as to bring within its provisions the express companies and the Pullman Car Company. For one I do not believe that it does.

In view of the experience of the past in connection with this all-important legislation, why not incorporate in this bill language so plain and unmistakable that there shall be no cause for equivocation in the future?

I think I am correct in stating that the framers of the original legislation sought at least to bring the express companies within its provisions, but in Interstate Commerce Commission Report (vol. 1, p. 349), in the matter of the express companies, Commissioner Walker used this language:

> Express business, conducted by an independent organization, acquiring transportation rights by contract, held not to be described in the act with sufficient precision to warrant the Commission in taking jurisdiction thereof.

And this contention of Commissioner Walker was sustained in an opinion in United States v. Morsman (42 Fed. Rep., 448), in which Justice Thayer said:

> Express companies, independently organized as corporations for the transaction of the express business on their own account, are not subject to the provisions of the interstate-commerce act.

And in Southern Indiana Express Company v. United States Express Company (88 Fed. Rep., 659) Judge Baker says also:

> The interstate-commerce act does not apply to independent express companies not operating railway lines.

And so, on page 3, after line 13, of this bill, I would insert:

> The provisions of this act shall be held to apply to all the services rendered by so-called "express companies" in the receipt, handling, transportation, and delivery of property as aforesaid.

I am quite sure this would obviate any further difficulty, so far as express companies are concerned. And who can give a satisfactory reason why they, as well as the Pullman Car Company, should not be brought within the terms of this bill?

So that there may be no question in the future as to what we intend to do regarding the Pullman Car Company, on page 3 of this bill, line 4, I would strike out, after the words "facilities of shipment or carriage," and insert these words, "for the transportation of passengers or property."

There is still another abuse grown up in this country which, I think, should be corrected at this time by an amendment to this bill, and that is the practice on the part of railroad companies of charging $30 for a thousand-mile mileage book, retaining the $10 for several months or a year, until the mileage is used, and then, in most cases, returning $10.

In Michigan some of the roads have recently adopted another course, whereby they only return $9.75, keeping 25 cents, alleging that this is done to pay for the cost of the cover of the mileage book. In this connection I would like to insert in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, some extracts from the Philadelphia Inquirer, a journal which is boldly and fearlessly making this fight in the interests of the people:

[From Philadelphia Inquirer, January 6, 1906.]

SAY MILEAGE BOOKS TIE UP MUCH CAPITAL—STRONG PROTEST AGAINST PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD'S PRACTICE IN DEMANDING DEPOSIT.

At a joint meeting last night of the passenger traffic committee of the Merchants and Travelers' Association and the railroad committee of of the Travelers' Protective Association, a strong protest was voiced against the practice of the Pennsylvania Railroad in requiring a deposit of $10 in excess of the regular price upon every mileage book purchased from it.

Gustav Daniel, chairman of the meeting declared emphatically that by forcing its patrons to make deposits on this transportation the Pennsylvania Railroad had virtually entered into the banking business, and that commercial houses all over this State had thousands of dollars tied up in mileage books they had purchased for their representatives on the road.

Attention was called to the fact that by insisting upon a deposit the Pennsylvania Railroad was enabled to have at its disposal a vast amount of money that really did not belong to it; that it could draw interest on it or invest it or do whatever it pleased.

CANVASSING BUSINESS MEN.

Mr. Daniel announced that a canvass was being made of business men in order that their sentiments regarding the money demanded by the railroad might be brought to the attention of the proper officials. He said that already hundreds of business men throughout the State had voiced their disapproval of the practice. He said that hundreds of protests were pouring in every day from business men, which it was the intention of the joint committee of the Merchants and Travelers' Association and the Travelers' Protective Association to present to the officials of the Pennsylvania Railroad in crystalized form. He added that a thorough canvass of the commercial interests of the State would be made before this action was taken in order that those interests might be represented in their entirety, when the committee waited upon the railroad officials.

Mr. Daniel said that efforts had been made in the past by the Merchants and Travelers' Association and the Travelers' Protective Association, each of which has a large and influential membership in the business world, to induce the Pennsylvania Railroad to withdraw its deposit requirement, but without avail.

SENTIMENT IS WIDESPREAD.

"We have already sounded the business interests of the State," said Mr. Daniel, "and we are confident that this time we shall be able to make the officials of the Pennsylvania Railroad realize how strong and widespread is the sentiment against its requiring a deposit upon its mileage books. We shall present the sentiment of the business interests of Pennsylvania to those officials in such a form as ought to cause them to understand that the patrons of the Pennsylvania Railroad regard such a deposit as an unnecessary and costly burden imposed upon them without rhyme or reason.

"In our interviews with the officials of the railroads heretofore we have been informed that the $10 deposit in excess of the regular price required upon the books was a sort of guaranty that the restrictions the railroad desired to impose upon those who used such books would be lived up to. We were also informed that the railroad expected to prevent 'scalping' and the loss thereby of a dollar or two on a mileage book.

COMMERCE BIGGER THAN RAILROAD.

"Surely we can say that the commercial interests of a big State like Pennsylvania are paramount to the danger of a railroad, even the Pennsylvania Railroad, losing a couple of dollars now and then.

"The requirement of deposits upon a mileage book is a serious proposition to the big commercial houses which have scores of representatives on the road all the time and must needs carry a large supply of mileage books. For instance, there is one firm that has $5,000 tied up in deposits on mileage books of the railroads. The Pennsylvania Railroad deprives this and other commercial houses of the use of thousands of dollars by its insistence upon its patrons making deposits upon mileage books. I need not say that the railroad has considerably the best of such an arrangement, while its patrons, particularly the bigger commercial houses, suffer greatly from inconvenience and expense of having large amounts of money tied up."

[From Philadelphia Inquirer.]

SECRETARY BROWN FLAYS PENNSY'S MILEAGE SCHEME—DEPOSIT SYSTEM COMES NEAR BANKING BUSINESS; "WHY NOT PAY INTEREST?" HE SAYS—CAN FIND NO LAW TO JUSTIFY IT.

[Special to the Inquirer.]

HARRISBURG, PA., January 10, 1906.

Maj. Isaac B. Brown, secretary of internal affairs of Pennsylvania, declared to-day that a railroad which demands a cash deposit in addition to the actual price of a mileage book is acting "in violation of at least the spirit of the constitution."

Major Brown quotes those provisions of the constitution of Pennsylvania which prohibit corporations, and particularly common carriers engaging in any other business than that for which they are incorporated.

The railroad which demands a $10 deposit from each purchaser of a mileage book, thereby accumulating "hundreds of thousands of dollars and undoubtedly millions," is "dangerously near the banking business."

SUGGESTS "INTEREST ON DEPOSITS."

"Proper regard for the depositors," he adds, "would suggest the payment of interest on deposits."

Major Brown has been the head of the State bureau of railways for seventeen years. He is a member of the executive committee of the National Association of Railway Commissioners, and is regarded as an authority on railway matters.

In commenting to-day on the movement inaugurated by the business men of Philadelphia to urge the Pennsylvania Railroad to abandon its demand for $10 deposits on mileage books, Secretary Brown said:

"Many years ago a thousand-mile mileage book was placed upon the market for $20, and was very generally approved and used by the traveling public. This was the voluntary act of the common carriers, and may be presumed to indicate, from the common carriers' point of view, a reasonable charge for such a mileage book.

"It is alleged that some of the purchasers of these books violated the contract contained in the book, and on account of this a deposit, as required by the new book, was demanded, equal to 50 per cent of the previous $20 charged, this deposit to be retained by the railroad company or traffic association until the book was fully used, and then the deposit to be returned to the purchaser under certain conditions.

WHERE DO THEY GET THE RIGHT?

"Where does the common carrier get the right to make such a demand?

"The demanding of $10 additional as a deposit from each purchaser of a book and the retention of the same for months, and in many cases for a year, must be either legal or illegal.

"If the charter of a corporation or the laws authorizing the same confer the right to make such demands, then the act is a legal one. If, on the contrary, the accumulation of hundreds of thousands of dollars, and undoubtedly millions, as a deposit from the purchasers of mileage books is not authorized by law, then the act is an illegal one.

"If we turn to section 6, Article XVI, of the constitution, we will find the following:

"'No corporation shall engage in any business other than that expressly authorized in its charter.'

"Again, in section 5, Article XVII, of the constitution, we find the following:

"'No incorporated company doing the business of a common carrier shall directly or indirectly engage in any other business than that of a common carrier.'

"It will be seen, therefore, that the restriction upon these corporations are explicit and easily comprehended. Is the holding up of millions of dollars from the channels of trade, as is done in the demands for a deposit on mileage books, not an engagement in a business other than that of a common carrier? It is dangerously near the banking business, and proper regard for the depositors would suggest the payment of interest on deposits.

NO LEGALITY.

"Where does the right come from to make such a demand? Certainly not from any law, directly or indirectly, and if such law existed it would be in violation of the constitution above quoted. Why should there be such a drainage on the financial affairs of commerce? What is there to justify it?

[From Philadelphia Enquirer, January 20, 1906.]

MERCHANTS UNITE IN MILEAGE FIGHT—LEADING ASSOCIATIONS DECIDE TO SEND STRONG PROTEST LETTER TO RAILROADS—EASTERN COMPANIES MADE TARGET OF POWERFUL TRADE ORGANIZATIONS AT JOINT MEETING.

With the sending of a sharp, incisive letter to the Pennsylvania, Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, Lehigh Valley, and Chesapeake and Ohio railroads, stating the attitude of the various trade bodies throughout the city with regard to the mileage matter, the war upon the $10 excess payment was launched in earnest last night.

A joint committee was appointed to take charge of the details of the fight. An aggressive chairman was elected. It was decided to send hundreds of petitions to various towns in the State, so that thousands of business men may have an opportunity to go upon record against the excess charge. The most important action of all, however, was the decision to send the letter throwing down the gauntlet to the railroads.

While the phrasing of the letter will not be given out for publication until some time to-day, it is known that the representatives of the trade bodies have not dealt gently with the excess-mileage question. They have pointed out the injustice of the demand for the deposit of $10 from each purchaser of a mileage book of 1,000 miles. They have urged that the object of the demand is to enrich the railroads at the expense of the traveling public, and that the time has come when some attention must be paid to a much-needed reform.

MERCHANTS IN EARNEST.

At times the arguments at the meeting of the joint committees of the trade bodies, held in the rooms of the Merchants and Travelers' Association, Thirteenth and Market streets, last night, were decidedly trenchant and heated. It was finally decided to place the matter before the railroads in a manner that will make its appeal to selfish self-interest.

As a result of this decision the railroads that compose the Trunk Line Association, including the Pennsylvania and the others previously mentioned, will be made aware, upon the receipt of the letter, that their own interests depend in a large measure upon their attitude in the mileage matter. It is pointed out that the trade bodies of this and surrounding cities are now aroused; that business men have resolved to divert freight and passenger traffic from the roads that act ungraciously.

Aside from the representatives of the Merchants and Travelers' Association there were present at the meeting representatives of the Commercial Exchange, the Travelers' Protective Association, and the Philadelphia Paper Stock Dealers' Association. J. P. Helfenstein, secretary of the Shamokin Board of Trade, sent a letter telling the committees they could count on his support, as did also the Erie Chamber of Commerce and the Business Men's League of Mechanicsburg.

From Mechanicsburg also there came the return of the first of the petitions sent out by the Merchants and Travelers' Association. It was filled with hundreds of names of persons who have the excess-payment fight at heart.

NAMED ADVISORY BOARD.

As soon as the joint committees settled down to work they decided to elect Gustave Daniel chairman of the joint committees, and named an advisory board consisting of the following: Frank S. Evans, president of the Merchants and Travelers' Association; R. R. Boggs, chairman of the Travelers' Protective Association; J. P. Collins, and Fred MacIntyre.

After it had been decided to draft the letter to the railroads one of the representatives present called attention to the efforts being made by the association known as the "Homeless Twenty-six," of Pittsburg, one of the most powerful organizations in that city, composed as it is of 18,000 of the most influential business, traveling, and professional men there, to have the excess payment declared illegal.

It was stated that the "Homeless Twenty-six" had just requested the State secretary of internal affairs to test the legality of the excess of $10 on the mileage books, and it was decided that the action of the Pittsburg organization should be indorsed and supported.

DRUMMER WRITES MILEAGE LIMERICK.

The following letter, with the appended Limerick, has been received by N. B. Kelly, secretary of the Trades League:

NYACK, N. Y. January 16, 1906.

Mr. N. B. KELLY, Secretary, Philadelphia, Pa.

MY DEAR SIR: Kindly hand inclosed to the reporter for the Inquirer who published my views on "1,000-mile refund tickets."

I am pretty busy, but find time to read Philadelphia newspapers, and am glad to see there is "something doing." "Keep the ball a-rolling."

This week I am traveling along Hudson River at 2 cents a mile flat on New York Central, West Shore, and Ontario and Western.

Sincerely,

ALFRED S. GOODWIN.

UNANIMOUS OPINION OF THE DRUMMERS.

There once was a man named Cassatt,
Who swore he would always "stand pat,"
And get his ten dollars,
No matter who "hollers,"
But we know he can't always do that.

In this connection and in order to correct this evil I would amend by inserting at the end of line 19, page 3, of this bill, these words:

It shall be unlawful for any common carrier or carriers subject to this act to charge, demand, accept, or receive, for the transportation of passengers as aforesaid, for the sale of so-called "mileage books," any sum in excess of the actual value thereof; no deposit shall be required from the purchaser of any such "mileage book," and no refund shall be made to such purchaser except for unused mileage.

[Applause.]

If this amendment fails, I would suggest inserting at the same place in the bill these words:

It shall be unlawful for any common carrier or carriers subject to this act to charge, demand, accept, or receive, for the transportation of passengers aforesaid, any sum in excess of 2 cents per mile of such transportation: Provided, That the Interstate Commerce Commission may, from time to time, upon full hearing and for good cause, authorize a higher charge per mile for such transportation.

During the course of this debate the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has given notice that at the proper time he would offer the following as an amendment to this bill, which I heartily indorse:

No president, director, officer, agent, or employee of any railroad, or other carrier of freight, and which is engaged in interstate commerce, shall be interested, directly or indirectly, in the furnishing of material or supplies to such company or in the business of transportation as a common carrier of freight or passengers over the works owned, leased, controlled, or worked by such company. Upon complaint and satisfactory proof of any violation of this provision such Commission shall order that the offices so held in violation of this act shall issue an order to such corporation to declare the offices or position so forfeited vacant, and to fill the places so vacated as is provided for in the organization and by-laws of such corporation.

In support of this amendment I desire to submit the following letter from Logan M. Bullitt, president of the Red Rock Fuel Company, Torresdale, Philadelphia:

RED ROCK FUEL COMPANY,
Torresdale, Philadelphia, January 23, 1906.

Hon. SAMUEL W. SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Red Rock Fuel Company is the owner of over 4,000 acres of valuable coal lands on the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad in Upshur County, W. Va., which it is endeavoring to develop. In pursuance of this purpose it has opened its mine, constructed a tipple, and built a side track from the tipple to the right of way of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad (some 4,000 feet), and is in a position to make large shipments of coal if it receives the same treatment that the Baltimore and Ohio accords to other shippers of coal on its line of railroad, viz, a connection between the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and its side track.

Nearly one year ago the Red Rock Fuel Company made an application to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company for such connection, agreeing to pay the entire cost of the same, and pointing out that it had been the practice of the railroad for years to furnish such connections to persons or corporations desiring to ship coal from lands adjacent to its lines on the terms offered by the Red Rock Fuel Company.

This request was met by a prompt refusal by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and with a further statement that it would not grant the connection requested, nor permit the Red Rock Fuel Company to become a shipper of coal if it could prevent it, on the ground that it (the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company) had more coal for transportation than it had facilities to carry it; but the real reason, as found by the Interstate Commerce Commission, as hereinafter set forth, was that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company owned a controlling interest in various coal companies along its line of railroad, which companies ship the bulk of the coal mined along its lines, and that it did not propose to have the Red Rock Fuel Company or any other concern compete with it for business.

Proceedings were commenced by the Red Rock Fuel Company before the Interstate Commerce Commission last May to require the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to furnish the desired connection. These proceedings resulted in a decision in favor of the Red Rock Fuel Company, in an opinion handed down on November 25, and, founded on this, an order was entered by the Commission requiring the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to desist from discriminating against the Red Rock Fuel Company in favor of other shippers and in favor of itself or to furnish the connection for the Red Rock Fuel Company by December 23, 1905. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company has failed to comply with this order, and has announced its intention to disregard it.

During the proceedings it developed that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company controls the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and that it has an interest in limiting the shipments of coal from the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, so as to prevent competition with coal mines on the lines of the Pennsylvania Railroad.

While the injury done in this case is only a private one to the Red Rock Fuel Company, yet it is such an abuse of railway franchises and such a perfectly clear-cut example of injustice on the part of a public servant, with no extenuating circumstances to becloud the main issue, that the Red Rock Fuel Company takes the liberty of inclosing you a copy of the Interstate Commerce Commission's decision in this matter, together with a very brief extract from the testimony taken during the hearing, touching upon the most important statements above made, with the hope that you will give it your attention.

Therefore your earnest consideration of the facts of this case is asked, not only in the interest of the Red Rock Fuel Company, but also in the interest of all independent coal shippers who have no railroad influence and the public generally, who have felt the oppressive force of railway abuses of a similar character, but whose cases perhaps are not susceptible of as clear and certain demonstration as this one, and your aid is respectfully invited to making such acts of oppression hereafter impossible.

A full investigation should be had of all the bituminous coal-carrying railroads reaching Atlantic ports and their relation to each other, and especially the question of whether they are interested in coal properties, as well as serving the public as carriers.

Should you desire any further information in regard to this matter it will be cheerfully furnished.

RED ROCK FUEL COMPANY.
LOGAN M. BULLITT, President.

It must be apparent to everyone that legislation of this character ought to receive prompt consideration at the hands of Congress. [Applause.]

Through the kindness of the distinguished Member from Tennessee, Mr. GAINES, I have received a copy of an amendment which he proposes to offer at the proper time as a new section to this bill. It reads as follows:

SEC. 9. That section 22 of the act of February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," be amended by adding thereto the following:

"Any officer or employee of any railroad included within the provisions of this act who shall make, issue, or give any free pass or passage ticket, not in good faith intended to be paid for, over such railroad, or any railroad connecting therewith, to any person not allowed or authorized to pass free according to the provisions of this section, or who shall pass or cause to pass free over such railroad any such person, and any person not so allowed or authorized to pass free who shall receive and use any such free pass or free passage ticket, or any evidence thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000 for each offense; and it shall be the duty of the several courts having jurisdiction to charge regularly their grand juries to investigate violations of this section."

No free passes or free passage ticket or evidence thereof shall be issued by or in behalf of any railroad corporation, unless they are signed by some officer of said corporation authorized by vote of the directors to sign the same, and every railroad corporation shall keep a record showing the date of every free pass, the name of the person to whom it is issued, the points between which the passage is granted, and whether a single trip or time pass, and, if the latter, the time for which it is issued, and this record shall at all times be opened to every stockholder in said corporation and to the Interstate Commerce Commission; and any railroad or person failing to comply with this provision shall be punished by fine not less than $2,000 for each offense, and it shall be the duty of said Commission to cause prosecutions to be instituted on account of the issue of any free passes or free passage tickets or evidence thereof contrary to law.

I have no idea that it will receive favorable consideration, but I hope that if it does not that he will introduce a bill covering the provisions of this amendment and make it still broader, covering the telegraph and express companies. Why should any exceptions be made? We are trying to legislate against rebates and discriminations. Let us not discriminate in this particular. It has been stated in the course of this debate that the railroad companies would welcome legislation of this character, and why should not the telegraph and express companies? It certainly must prove a great burden to them, and then, too, it has been clearly demonstrated, and no one will dispute it, that when any person is so fortunate as to be the recipient of favors at the hands of the railroad companies some one else must be the sufferer and help to pay the loss. Is this not equally true in the case of the telegraph and express companies?

Listen, please, to what distinguished railroad officials and others say in this connection.

Hon. Paul Morton, recently a member of President Roosevelt's Cabinet and vice-president of the Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad, made the following statement before the Industrial Commission November 22, 1899:

Passes are given for many reasons, almost all of which are bad ones. There should be no passes printed. Even railroad officials or employees traveling on other lines than those they work for should be required to pay fare. The chief reason that stimulates a man to ask a railroad company for a free pass is that somebody else has it. Passes are given for personal, political, and commercial reasons, and in exchange for advertising, for services, and for various other reasons. I am in favor of the total abolition of railroad passes, and this view is held by a large number of the railroads of the country, as will be seen by the extract, quoted below, from the proceedings of a meeting of executive officers of western, northwestern, and southwestern railroads, held in October last in St. Louis:

"Recommended:

"First. That all free or reduced transportation of every description both State and interstate, with the exception of that to railroad employees, be discontinued.

"Second. That reduced or free transportation to railroad employees be very much restricted.

"Third. That a joint meeting of all the leading American lines be called for the purpose of considering this subject, with the end in view of entirely stopping the pass abuse.

"Fourth. That a copy of these recommendations be submitted to all lines, with the request that they each go on record as to their views, and, if they favor discontinuing the practice of issuing free transportation, state how many railroads they believe should subscribe to the movement in order to make it effective."

The foregoing recommendations were submitted to the executive officers of 265 railroads, representing a mileage of 184,000 miles—practically all of the mileage of the country.

Replies in favor of radical action in either abolishing or restricting the issuance of free transportation have been received from 129 of the railroads thus addressed, representing 150,590 miles.

While this indicates that a large proportion of the railroads want to shut off the free-pass abuse, I doubt if anything ever comes of it until Congress passes a law prohibiting it.

There should be no unjust discriminations in rates of freight or fares in favor of individuals or localities.

Transportation is a public service, and the charges are in the nature of a tax. They should be absolutely fair to all. Almost any kind of legislation that will insure this will be wise.

One great difficulty that the railroads have to contend with is the adjustment of relative rates from competing distributing points. Much money has been wasted in contending for differential rates in favor of this place or that, and there ought to be some tribunal—such as the Interstate Commerce Commission—empowered to settle such disputes. Many of the rate wars of the western country have been caused by such contentions, and the result has generally been a restoration of old conditions, an arbitration, or a slight concession of some kind or another."

Col. John H. Reagan said:

"3. The allowance of free passes by the railroad companies is not done as a matter of charity, for they are not, as a rule, given to the poor and needy, but for the most part to public officials and to influential persons. It is one method of unjustly discriminating in freight rates in a way that it is difficult, if not impossible, to prevent, by furnishing free passes to shippers, their families, their agents, etc. And as the revenues of the roads must be kept up, it is the taxing of one part of the people for the benefit of another part of them which violates the commonest rules of right, and it is undoubtedly employed as one of the means of influencing public officials and members of legislative bodies in the performance of their official duties. It is unfair, unjust, and demoralizing, and should be prohibited by Congress and the several legislatures in their respective spheres of authority."

Mr. A. B. Stickney, president of the Chicago Great Western Railroad, in part said:

"That is the way with this pass business. If it never had been or if there was some way to get rid of it without raising too much of a disturbance, I should think it was a good thing to get rid of, and I don't know but it is anyway.

"Q. As a railroad man, taking your side of it, should you prefer to be rid of it?—A. Oh, Lord, yes; it is like Congressman patronage, which I should think every Congressman would be glad to get rid of.

* * * * * * *

"Q. (By Professor JOHNSON.) Do the members of the judiciary of Minnesota and Illinois hold passes over your road?—A. I don't think they do; I am not certain about that. If any of them ask for transportation, they get it; we don't hesitate to give to men of that class if they ask for passes; we never feel at liberty to refuse.

"Q. (By Mr. KENNEDY.) You say that if members of the judiciary ask for a pass they will get it. Is there any reason why a judge of a court who gets a good salary should get a pass—that is to say, is there any greater reason than why John Smith should have a pass?—A. That depends upon what you would call a good reason.

"Q. Is there any reason that would not avail so far as the general public is concerned?—A. Twenty-five years ago I had charge of a little bit of a road that was a sort of a subordinate of a larger road. I had occasion to visit the president of the superior road about something, and he said: 'Mr. Stickney, I see that the sheriff of this county has a pass over your road. I should like to know on what principle you gave that sheriff a pass?' I said, 'I did it on the principle that he was a power, and I was afraid to refuse him.' 'Well,' he said, 'I refused him.' I said, 'You will wish you hadn't before the year is over.' Some time afterwards, and during the year, I went into the office to see the superintendent, but he was not in; I went into the general freight agent's office, and he was not in; I went into the general manager's office, and he was not in. So I then went into the office of the president and said, 'What kind of a road have you got? Your superintendent is not here, your general freight agent is not here, and your general manager is not here.' He hung his head down and said: 'Do you remember that conversation we had about that sheriff's pass? He has got all these men on the jury and has got them stuck for about two weeks.'

"Q. That answer seems to indicate that railroads would be afraid to refuse for fear of the penalties?—A. I think the railroads find there is a class of men that it is to their interest not to refuse if they ask for passes.

"Q. Is it not bad in morals that a judge of a court should get a pass in that way and that a private citizen could not get one?—A. I would rather not assume to be a judge of morals; let other men judge of that for themselves.

"Q. Still, you say you would like to be rid of the pass system?—A. Yes.

"Q. (By Professor JOHNSON.) Would you like to have Congress prohibit the granting of passes for interstate traffic?—A. That might help things and it might not. Legislation on such things works an advantage sometimes, and sometimes it does not altogether.

"Q. It seems to me that it would be useless to have such laws if you could not enforce them and punish the man who gives passes or the man who receives them.—A. Well, I don't know. I notice in England and on the Continent that they have a great many laws regulating these things, and you will see signs posted stating that such and such things are forbidden under penalty of 10 shillings or 20 shillings, and I notice they enforce these laws. Now, let Congress pass a law forbidding passes and impose a penalty of $5 or $15, or some sum like that, and there should be some possibility of enforcing it; but impose a penalty of five years' imprisonment or $5,000, and I don't think you are going to get the American people to enforce any such penalties."

Mr. Stuyvesant Fish, president of the Illinois Central, says:

"Q. (By Professor JOHNSON.) Is not the granting of passes an illegal discrimination when you carry a man across the boundary of a State?—A. I would rather you would prove it by some other witness, gentleman, to put it in all candor. [Laughter.]

"Q. (By Senator MALLORY.) Do you regard it as an evil?—A. Yes. I am so constituted I do not believe in giving something for nothing under any circumstances. I think the evil of the pass situation is, seriously, this: It is the only way of getting value out of the treasury of the railroad company without leaving a voucher. There is no other way known to me.

"Q. (By Professor JOHNSON.) Do not the railroad companies give these passes for value to be received?—A. Some of them, but the particular value received is not of record.

"Q. It is not of record, but is it not in the form of favors of various kinds?—A. I am giving passes now to persons that are serving the company well, and they are entitled to it. I can defend hundreds of passes. There are reasons; but the same thing would enable me to go right to the treasury of the company and put in a voucher and give these men, say, $100, just exactly the same. If it is defensible for value received, it can be paid by money.

"Q. (By Senator MALLORY.) What do you say about these passes given to members of the legislature and Members of Congress and Senators?—A. I think the whole thing should be stopped.

"Q. Do you think there is value received in this case?—A. I have been told there is at times."

Mr. Samuel Spencer, president of the Southern Railroad, said:

"Q. Do you not think that the generally recognized violation of any law has a bad moral effect on the community in which that violation is practiced?—A. I think so, undoubtedly. It weakens the moral force of the community at large.

"Q. That being so, can you state to the Commission to what extent the free-pass system, or free-transportation system, is practiced? I will not ask in reference to your railroad, but railroads in general in this country.—A. I will be very glad to have you specify.

"Q. Well, your railroad.—A. The policy of the Southern is that its whole business shall be public to one and all. I have no objection to answering generally or specifically if you want it. The pass system has grown to be an abuse throughout the entire country, and it is an abuse on the Southern just as well as it is on other roads, but I hope not to the same extent; but it is an abuse, and one which at the moment we can not throw off.

"Q. It is just as much prohibited or more prohibited than the ticket-brokerage system?—A. No; not so specifically provided for as the public notice of reduced ticket rate that I have spoken of. The language of the interstate-commerce law upon that subject is such that the prohibition of passes is covered by a general clause. There is no specific law in regard to the free-transportation system only in the question of discrimination.

"Q. It is included in that?—A. It is included in that, undoubtedly. But you can not put your finger on it with quite the same specificness as you can the other provision.

"Q. You say it is generally abused. You mean by that that passes are given without consideration?—A. Without really a proper consideration, yes.

"Q. Legitimate consideration?—A. Yes.

"Q. And you think it is a general abuse?—A. I do. I think it is widespread all over this country.

"Q. Do you not think it would be well, if it is feasible, to have legislation enacted that will prevent it?—A. I would like to see a statute passed that there should not be one issued to anyone."

Prof. E. R. Johnson, president of the University of Pennsylvania, said:

"Q. (By Mr. KENNEDY.) Have you anything to say about the practice of giving passes, State laws prohibiting them, etc.?—A. I think it is something that ought to be prohibited by law. I think passes ought without exception to be restricted to actual employees of the railway corporations, and there is no doubt in my mind that the influences of the pass system upon our legislatures and judiciary are altogether bad."

Commissioner Knapp said:

"It would be impossible to say to what extent that results in diminished revenue to the carrier. I have heard it claimed—I know nothing about it, and make the statement only on that information—that probably the actual revenues received by all the railroads of the country from their passenger business did not exceed 75 or 80 per cent of what they would be at the published rates multiplied by the journeys actually taken.

"Q. If it would be possible to abolish this pass system, which is just as bad a discrimination as the freight, in fact worse, what effect do you think it would have on the cash fare—would it lower the rates of a paying passenger or would not the railroads charge the same, taking the usufruct of the whole for themselves?—A. What would result I can not say.

"Q. What would be your opinion, in your Interstate Commerce Commission, about a question of that kind?—A. I should feel warranted in answering your question this way: If we could eliminate the free transportation and bring this public service down to the impartial conditions where every person who uses it pays his proper share, I believe the passenger rates throughout the country could be materially reduced and still the railroads have better returns from that branch of their service than they have at the present time.

"Q. Is it possible to amend the interstate-commerce bill to abolish passes?—A. I think so, surely, and a good many other things that now occur.

"Q. (By Mr. RATCHFORD.) Is it not a fact that professional men and ministers of the gospel usually are provided with passes?—A. I am not aware that professional men as a class ordinarily receive any concessions, but clergymen as a rule get half rates.

"Q. (By Mr. KENNEDY.) Does the practice extend to Federal and State judiciary and district attorneys?—A. I do not know. I think the practice is diverse. My opinion is that in many sections of the country the judiciary, both Federal and State, have free transportation. In some cases it is not accepted. In some States it is prohibited; in others it is in a way recognized as one of the perquisites and emoluments of the office.

"Q. (By Professor JOHNSON.) It was testified before your commission by an officer of the Louisville and Nashville that his railroad gave passes to judicial officers.—A. Yes; but there is no such general practice, I mean to say, as corresponds with the arrangement in which clergymen get half rates. That is quite universal."

In 122 North Carolina Reports this most interesting statement may be found in the opinion delivered by Justice Douglass:

It is currently reported that a hundred thousand passes were issued in the State of North Carolina within the year 1897. Of our three leading railroad systems, one reported over 15,000 passes issued, while another reported 30,000. The defendant herein, the largest system of all, and having a direct pecuniary interest of vital importance before the legislature, refused to make any report, relying upon its legal exemption from compulsory self-incrimination.

Taking the estimate of 100,000 passes as correct, as it is 397 miles from Raleigh to Murphy, on the west, and still farther to Elizabeth City, on the east, it is fair to assume that each pass would represent at least 100 miles of travel, equal to $3.25 in fare.

This would represent the equivalent of $325,000 a year given to somebody, but to whom we do not know and for what purpose we need not inquire. These figures may not be correct, but they are the best obtainable under the circumstances.

It is needless to suppose that transportation of such great pecuniary value would be given without some return, either present or prospective, and in any aspect its continuance would be unjust to the public interest and dangerous to the public welfare.

Free transportation to so large an amount would necessarily place an additional burden upon the traveling public to make up the deficiency, while its irresponsible distribution would be a serious menace to public morality. So far, I fully concur in the opinion of the court.

In the Cullom report we find this language: "That a privileged class is created by the granting of passes, and that the cost of the passenger service is largely increased by the extent of this abuse."

I am sure that it will not be necessary to offer any more or further convincing proof of this nature, for I am confident that we are all agreed that the conclusions arrived at by these various gentlemen are entirely correct.

Under the present rates as charged by the telegraph and express companies it is a luxury to be able to send a telegram or use the express. I insist that the rate should be so low, so fair, so just as between the companies and the people that it should be a matter of almost daily convenience to the great body of our people.

I feel that the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce are to be congratulated for their excellent work and for the broad statesmanship which they have exhibited in arriving at a conclusion which meets with their unanimous approval. They do not claim perfection for the bill, but say it is the best they could do under all the existing circumstances.

In view of the deep interest manifested by a large majority of our constituents and an almost universal demand that some legislation of this kind be passed, reenforced by the earnest wish and desire of the President, and the almost certain result that this bill will receive practically the solid support of this body, it is to be hoped that in the very near future it may be enacted into law, and when this is done may we not all confidently expect that some evils have been corrected which have proved a menace to the vast business interests of the country? Let us fervently hope that our efforts have not been in vain and that out of this legislation will come great good that will prove the wisdom and greatness of our people. [Loud applause.]

Injustice of the Statehood Bill.

OF

HON. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 25, 1906,

On the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. GOULDEN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Having spent some time in New Mexico and having a knowledge of the people of Arizona, I am opposed to the bill providing joint statehood for these Territories. It is true that the population, as measured by the great States east of the Rocky Mountains, is small, but when compared with such bright examples of statehood as Idaho, Wyoming, Montana, the Dakotas, Washington, and Oregon, the people of those Territories have no occasion to blush. With the rights and privileges of statehood the inhabitants would measure up to the full standard as to duties and responsibilities of citizenship. My experience in a month's visit to New Mexico confirmed these statements. I found the people intelligent, honorable, and patriotic, possessing much in common with those of other sections of our common country.

Much is heard on the floor of the House against the crime of admitting Territories with a small population, and of the injustice of the other forty-five States of the Union. In this connection I desire to read from that sterling metropolitan newspaper, the New York Times, of this morning, and to have it made a part of my speech.

Every other State in the Union at the time of its admission has had a substantially homogeneous population; at least they were sufficiently near in blood and speech, in interest, and in aspiration to live at peace among themselves and to work in harmony for their own political upbuilding. There is grave reason for fear that Arizona and New Mexico, if taken into the Union as one State, will not get on together upon terms of peace. Between populations so dissimilar there is always danger of civil disturbance. There is no hurry about admitting these Territories. They have no proper qualification for statehood separately. If to take them in as one State is, as Mr. BABCOCK said, a "crime," why is it perpetrated? The Wisconsin Member declares that the Republicans are afraid that if the present bill is not passed these Territories will be admitted separately a few years hence, and will send four Democratic Senators to Washington. That is a consideration which we are afraid would weigh heavily with a Republican caucus. It may or may not have its influence with the Administration. It is a pretty extreme extension of the spirit of partisanship. To treat the composition of the Union and its enlargement by the admission of new States as a matter to be determined by the interests of the Republican party is a policy which, not to put too fine a point on it, must be described as detestable.

There is no justification for this proposed measure, and in the interests of the Territories named, in the interests of a common brotherhood, as well as in the interests of justice and a "square deal," it should be defeated.

Now, as to the means adopted to get this bill through the House. A rule that cuts off all amendment has no place in a representative body like this; gag law is un-American, and the party that indulges in this unholy practice to bolster up a bad cause merits, and will receive, the punishment due to the crime. It matters not what political party makes use of such questionable tactics, it merits condemnation, and unless the signs of the times fail, the people will register their verdict in November next against the Republican party by putting the grand old Democracy again in power.

I beg leave to read from a sound Republican paper, one of the President's warmest supporters, the New York Sun of yesterday, on this phase of the bill now under consideration.

The Republicans who resisted the partial relief to the industries of the Philippines afforded by the Philippine revenue bill resisted a measure of justice, in so far as it went. Their course was for the supposed benefit of beet-sugar farmers and factories in their districts. It was selfish, but intelligible. They were beaten, and deservedly beaten. Their "insurrection" rested upon a narrow and local basis. The broader, more generous, more humane, more patriotic policy triumphed.

The "insurrection" against the Hamilton statehood bill has no narrow or selfish causes. It rests upon the American principle of self-government. The people of Arizona are strongly opposed to the union of that Territory with New Mexico and the formation of one State out of the two Territories, so dissimilar in population, so physically set apart from one another. If the people of Arizona are not opposed to that union, why are the supporters of the joint statehood bill afraid to allow them and the New Mexicans to vote separately on the question? Why are those supporters trying to force through the House to-day a rule prohibiting amendments to the bill?

Is it fair, is it just, is it American to force upon the Arizonians a union which they hate?

The "insurgents" against such a union have right and justice on their side. They should fight to the end, and not surrender.

All honor to the brave, patriotic Republicans who will register their votes against this iniquitous measure. Their names will constitute a roll of honor of which all true Americans can be proud, and their example will be a beacon light for others in this and other legislative bodies of our beloved country.

Railroad Rate Bill.

SPEECH

OF

HON. JOSEPH H. GAINES,

OF WEST VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 6, 1906.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission—

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The extent to which this bill has been criticised by some gentlemen because, in their opinion, it went too far and by others because, in their opinion, it did not go far enough seems to me to indicate that the committee has been fairly successful in proposing a conservative, well-considered measure. The legislation sought to be accomplished by this bill is of great importance. No one can be more sensible of its far-reaching character and the great good to be accomplished by it or the great harm to be done by it than are the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, who have given it long consideration. We are proposing to try to regulate the practices of the railroad companies of this country in such a way that if our legislation should turn out to be wise we do the country great good, but in such a way also that if our legislation turns out to be ill advised we will inflict great harm upon the country.

I take very little interest, Mr. Chairman, in the suggestion made here that gentlemen who may be honestly opposed to this legislation should beware of the popular clamor in its favor. For myself, I do not legislate for popular clamor, and I believe that if the action which we take here is unwise; if we pass laws that shall not turn out for the public good, but do injury to the people, it will be an insufficient answer for us before our constituents to say that they urged us to take this course. They will judge us by the wisdom of our legislation, whether they advise us to take the step or not.

Those, Mr. Chairman, who oppose this legislation seem somehow to imagine that those who favor it are the only ones who do not appreciate the difficulties of the transportation problem.

We have no hope that we are going to relieve all the ills of the body politic by this law. We have no hope that conflicts hereafter between shippers and railroad companies will not come even if we pass this law. We are as well aware as gentlemen upon the other side of this proposition that all transportation proceeds upon discriminations. We know, for instance, that if the railroad companies can not transport the shoes of Boston to West Virginia by the carload for a smaller sum than they would charge for a carload of coal from West Virginia to Boston—if the railroad companies may not charge less in proportion to the class of freight and the distance for a carload of wheat from Minnesota to the seaboard than they charge for a carload of coal from West Virginia to the ocean—the railroads could not move coal or wheat or shoes. We know that it is necessary for the railroads to fix their tariffs with reference to promoting the movement of the largest possible amount of freight. That means, of course, that they must put their tariff down to a point that will permit the traffic to be hauled; in other words, to what the traffic can afford to pay. It is not the expectation of those who favor the legislation that persons who live near large cities shall be given the monopoly of the markets. No man has a right to ask a monopoly of any market. He has only the right to ask that he shall be treated fairly in comparison with others and that reasonable rates be charged for his traffic.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are not attempting the exercise of any new power. Gentlemen like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] seem to think there is something socialistic in this legislation. As has been frequently pointed out in the course of this debate, the Government has time out of mind regulated common carriers. Governments have always regulated the tolls to be paid on highways; they have always regulated the charges upon canals; they have exercised the power always to regulate hack fares in cities; and there is no State, I fancy, in this Union whose legislature has not passed some bill regulating railroad rates for the transportation of persons and of property. The reason for it is obvious. It follows from the nature of these classes of property. Railroads have been considered in this debate as private property, and it has again been said that a railroad is public property. As usual, between two extreme opinions of this sort, the truth lies midway. A railroad, as I understand it, is, in the conception of the law, a public agency operated by private capital. The private capital is entitled to its just and fair return, and also the public interest to be served should equally be guarded by the law.

The Supreme Court of the United States has laid down fully the two propositions, both that the private property in the corporation must be protected and also that these great public-service corporations own their property subject to rights of the public in them.

The Supreme Court, in Smyth against Ames, says:

> It can not be assumed that any railroad corporation, accepting franchises, rights, and privileges at the hands of the public, ever supposed that it acquired, or that it was intended to grant to it, the power to construct and maintain a public highway simply for its benefit without regard to the rights of the public. But it is equally true that corporations performing public services and the people beneficially interested in its business and affairs have rights that may not be invaded by legislative enactments in disregard of fundamental guaranties for the protection of property. The corporation may not be required to use its property for the benefit of the public without receiving just compensation for the services rendered by it.

Again the court says:

> What the company is entitled to ask is a fair return upon the value of that which it employs for public convenience. On the other hand, what the public is entitled to demand is that no more be exacted from it for use of the public highways than the services rendered by it are reasonably worth.

There has been considerable discussion in this debate as to what is the rule that protects the property of the railroad company. If the legislative power should undertake to fix a rate which was not justly compensatory some persons have said that the courts may intervene. Others have said that the courts may not interfere unless the power fixing the rate has fixed one that is "confiscatory."

Members will notice that in this bill the committee has avoided a discussion whether the common carrier ought to be held down in its remedies merely to the avoidance of what is confiscatory. The committee has said that when a rate complained of is, in the opinion of the Commission, unreasonable the Commission may establish a fairly remunerative rate to be thereafter regarded as the maximum rate. Some gentlemen have seemed to think that this is too favorable to the transportation company—that we ought not to enlarge what it is claimed was the intention of the Supreme Court in its language in the case of Smyth v. Ames. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that we have enlarged the spirit of that language. It seems to me to be as confiscatory to deprive the railroad company of just compensation—of a fair return upon its property—as it would be to deprive it of the property itself.

But without regard to that we have thought it only fair to put in the law a specific provision that the transportation companies shall be entitled to a fairly remunerative rate. Now, while for the first time we empower a commission, when it has upon hearing found a rate to be unreasonable, to substitute in its place the rate which the Commission shall deem to be just and reasonable and fairly compensatory to the company, this is not the first time that that power has been exercised. It was supposed for many years to have been conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission by the original act. That has been disputed. It has been said in this debate that the Interstate Commerce Commission at one time exercised that power, and it has been denied that it ever exercised the power. Because of this contention, and because it seems not yet to have been settled, I desire to read the language of Commissioner Prouty, where he not only asserts that the Commission at one time exercised that right, but gives a case in which the Commission actually did exercise it. He says:

> The first order this Commission ever made establishing a rate was made in the case of Evans against the Oregon Navigation Company or the Oregon Short Line—I forget which. The thing involved there was the rate on wheat from Walla Walla to Portland. The rate in effect was 30 cents. The rate the Commission ordered was 23½ cents. What the Commission did was to order the defendant to cease and desist from charging more than 23½ cents.

The railroad obeyed. In other words, to comment upon it in passing, the Commission named, not an exact rate to be in effect for the future, but passed an order which amounted to what is now the authority given the Commission in this bill. It directed what should thereafter be the maximum rate, by requiring that the railroad company should cease and desist from charging more than a certain amount. He goes on:

> That was the form of the order which the Commission made and it is the form of the order which the Commission has always made.

Upon a very considerable examination of these cases and the history of the Interstate Commerce Commission I think there can be no doubt in the mind of any impartial man, first, that the Commission did for a number of years deem itself clothed with the authority to name a reasonable rate where upon complaint and hearing it had found a rate to be unreasonable; and, second, that it exercised the power in the main wisely; so that the benefits of the act to the patrons of railroads did not operate any injury to the common carriers themselves. And I believe that if this bill shall become a law the railroad companies themselves will so often comply with its provisions that it will be unnecessary in many cases to seek the aid of the Commission.

I do not understand the position taken by some gentlemen who say that this gives the Interstate Commerce Commission such power that it is likely that all of the rates of the country will be before the Commission at one time, or, at least, a great number of them. One can not take that position, it seems to me, unless he believes that the carriers are almost always in the wrong; and I take it that nobody believes that who has looked into the situation. Most of the rates of the country are fair and just. The practice of the carriers is generally in obedience to and in conformity with the law, I believe, and not in contravention of it. But these gentlemen who think that the railroads will be cited before the Interstate Commerce Commission with reference to a great number of the rates in this country at one time must believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission itself will be very incapable, or that the temper of the American people is very unfair toward the railroads, or that the railroads themselves propose to violate in a wholesale way any law which we place upon the statute books. It seems to me you might just as well argue what would happen in the courts of the country if one-half of the people at one time sued the other half, and then draw the conclusion that we are in danger of intolerable confusion from the administration of justice. I apprehend no such condition of affairs. I believe that there will be fewer cases before the Interstate Commerce Commission after the passage of a law of this sort, if you clothe that Commission with power, than there are at this time, when the country seems in doubt to know where the power rests to correct a violation of its duty to the public by one of the great common carriers of the country.

The greatest argument, to my mind, Mr. Chairman, against this legislation is one which, if valid, would be equally so against any sort of law at all regulating the common carriers of this country. It is said by a great many gentlemen that the carriers should be left alone to make rates without any sort of power in the Commission or anyone else to supervise or regulate them. It is said that this country has become great, not by reason of its railroads, and that is true; not by reason of its captains of industry, and that is true; not by reason of its laws mainly, and that also is true, but by reason of the great energy and initiative of the American people, and we are urged by gentlemen not to interfere with that, but to give it the fullest scope; and we are assured by them that that will be of greater advantage to the people of this country than any law that we could pass. Many gentlemen believe that rate making is so difficult that it can not be regulated by any Government commission; that rates can only be made by the pressure of business, by the combined judgment and necessity of the shippers and the traffic men of the railroads, and particularly that individual initiative in that matter should not be interfered with; that these things regulate themselves by the force of competition, and can not be otherwise regulated.

I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I should have great hesitation in interfering with the operation of free competition anywhere. I do not assert, nor do I admit, that competition unrestricted and fierce between the common carriers of the country is a good thing. My own limited observation and experience in connection with rate making has led me to believe that stability of rates, if the rates be fairly reasonable and just in themselves and not discriminatory, is of quite as much importance as competition, and more important perhaps than competition. One can not know what price to charge for any time in the future for his products unless he has some certainty what the rate is to be in the future. I shall not enter upon the discussion sometimes made as to whether railroad rates are a commodity or a tax. I believe that to be one of those questions which are academic merely, and not practical. But railroad rates operate very much like a tax, and it certainly is of importance that they should be reasonably stable. In regard to the belief that gentlemen who are opposed to this bill have asserted, viz, that the protection of the shipper and the consignee and the protection of the public in this country in the matter of railroad rates is to be found in competition, it is a sufficient answer to say to them it has been a long time in this country since competition acted freely among the transportation companies. The railroad companies and traffic managers and railroad presidents have confidently asserted that the welfare of the country and the public, as well as the prosperity of the transportation lines, demanded that there should be some sort of agreement among them for the purpose of controlling rates and territory. On the 14th day of January, 1892, some thirty-odd railroads operating in the South entered into an agreement, the language of which sounds much at variance with the views taken by gentlemen on this floor who claim that the railroads should be left to free and unrestricted competition among each other. I read from the agreement of the Southern Railway and Steamship Association of America:

This agreement, made this 14th day of January, A. D. 1892, by the parties whose signatures are hereto attached, witnesseth that—

Whereas the establishment and maintenance of tariffs of uniform rates to prevent unjust discrimination such as necessarily arises from the irregular and fluctuating rates which inevitably attend the separate and independent action of transportation lines is important for the protection of the public; and

Whereas it is deemed to be the mutual advantage of the public and the transportation companies that business in which they have a common interest—

And right there, Mr. Chairman; I have never known a railroad lawyer in my life who denied that the railroads owned their properties subject to the public right to use them. I have never known one who denied that the right of the public in those roads to equal and just treatment was as much a matter of vested property right and the protection of it as important to the protection of property rights, as the protection of the private corporate interests of the railroad companies themselves—

Whereas it is deemed to be the mutual advantage of the public and the transportation companies that business in which they have a common interest should be so conducted as to secure a proper correlation of rates, such as will protect the interests of competing markets without unjust discrimination in favor of or against any city or section; and

Whereas these objects can be attained by the cooperation on the part of the various transportation lines engaged in the traffic of the territory south of the Potomac and Ohio rivers and east of the Mississippi River—

So much for the preamble. I shall not read, Mr. Chairman, much of the agreement, but I only want to read enough of it to indicate that competition—individual initiative—was destroyed in this country long before the Government undertook to regulate rates. [Applause.] So far is that true that while the agreement I am now reading was dated after the first act for the regulation of commerce, as a matter of fact agreements had been constantly made before; and it was the making of these agreements—it was the destruction of individual initiative by such agreements—and it was the assertion through such agreements by the railroad people themselves that something else than the law of competition was necessary to protect the railroad properties and to protect the public right in the use of those properties that led the Government in the first place to undertake their regulation by a Congressional commission. Now, let us see what they do. You have been talked to of the drastic power exercised by this bill. No bill that has ever been proposed at this or any other session of Congress has ever attempted to vest in the Commission such drastic power as has been exercised time and again in this country by the railroad people by means of illegal agreements in restriction of trade and commerce.

The first six sections of this agreement are as follows:

SECTION 1. The traffic subject to this agreement shall be (a) all business for which two or more of the parties hereto compete, having origin and destination within the territory of this association—that is, south of the Virginias and south of the Ohio River and east of the Mississippi River, and (b) all traffic between territory on or north of the southern boundaries of the Virginias and on or north of the Ohio River and west of the Mississippi River, and the territory south of such south boundary of the Virginias and the Ohio River and east of the Mississippi River, except that traffic to or from a local point on any line shall be considered local to that line, and so far as that line may be concerned shall not be subject to this agreement, and further except that traffic between points on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers or between points on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers and points north of the Ohio and west of the Mississippi River shall not be subject to this agreement.

SEC. 2. For the mutual protection of the various interests and for the purpose of securing the greatest amount of net revenue to all the companies parties to this agreement, it is agreed that what are termed "western" lines shall protect the revenue derived from transportation by what are known as "eastern" lines, under the rates as fixed by this association, so far as can be done by the exaction of local rates, and that eastern lines shall in like manner protect like revenue of western lines.

SEC. 3. That a line from Buffalo through Salamanca, Pittsburg, Wheeling, and Parkersburg to Huntington, W. Va., be made the dividing line between eastern and western lines for the territory hereinafter outlined. That the western lines shall not make joint rates from points east of that line for any points east of a line drawn from Chattanooga through Birmingham, Selma, and Montgomery to Pensacola.

SEC. 4. The eastern lines, including the Richmond and Danville Railroad via Strasburg or points east of Strasburg, and the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Railway via Bristol, shall not make joint rates on traffic from points west of that line (Buffalo, etc.) to any points on or west of a line drawn from Chattanooga through Athens, Augusta, and Macon to Liveoak, Fla.

SEC. 5. The traffic from Buffalo through Salamanca, Pittsburg, Wheeling, and Parkersburg to Huntington, W. Va., and points on that line to and east of Chattanooga, Calera, and Selma shall be carried by either the eastern or western lines only at such rates as may be agreed upon.

SEC. 6. It is understood that the eastern and western lines will cooperate in the enforcement of the third and fourth sections of this second article.

And so it continues, Mr. Chairman. I have read sufficient to show that not only do they agree on rates and enter into agreements as to what lines should make or should not make joint rates—not only determine what lines should carry certain freight and what should carry certain other freight—but they actually assume to parcel the territory of the country among themselves as being the exclusive territory of this or that railroad, a power so drastic that no Congress would ever think of exercising one equally so, that even the Autocrat of all the Russias himself would not have at any time undertaken its exercise.

A few years ago, Mr. Chairman, I introduced in this House a resolution to have examined by the Interstate Commerce Commission and to have a report made thereon the control of certain coal-carrying roads in West Virginia by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. I was absent from the House a few days ago when a resolution similar, I take it, passed this House, except that the resolution which I introduced did not require this information from the President of the United States, and I would not have introduced a resolution demanding the information from him or have voted for such a resolution had I been present. The resolution which I introduced was directed to the Interstate Commerce Commission, not to the President. It was followed a few months afterwards by a report from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce giving this very information. The same information was given by Commissioner Clements in his statement before the Senate committee during the hearings last fall, and all gentlemen should have read it. I shall, with the permission of the committee, append that statement to my remarks. I shall not read it now, but shall describe to some extent what it contains. That report shows that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the New York Central Railroad Company may control and do control the competing coal-carrying roads in West Virginia, to wit, the Baltimore and Ohio, the Chesapeake and Ohio, and the Norfolk and Western. West Virginia occupies, with reference to the coal trade, a peculiar relation. The coal of West Virginia might be called the competing coal of the United States. West Virginia mines perhaps one-fourth as much of soft coal as Pennsylvania and sends perhaps as much soft coal out of its borders as Pennsylvania sends from hers. That is due to the fact that Pennsylvania has large industries to consume her own coal and West Virginia has very few of them. The purpose of the Pennsylvania Railroad in getting control of these roads was to limit the shipments, and that control has limited the shipments made from West Virginia to the rest of the country. West Virginia coal goes to New England and the West. That which goes to New England must enter into competition with the coal hauled by the Reading and the Lehigh Valley and Pennsylvania railroads, and that which goes West must pass by the tipple of the Hocking Valley Company, in the district of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], or it must pass the coal mines of the Illinois coal fields. So I say it is the competing and regulating coal of this country. It was for the purpose of preventing what they deemed to be so rapid a development of these coal fields that it would demoralize the coal trade of the country that the Pennsylvania Railroad secured the control of the competing coal roads of West Virginia. As the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission will show, this was done by a form of "community of interest." The Pennsylvania Railroad Company and affiliated lines proceeded to get control of a sufficient amount of the stock of the Chesapeake and Ohio, the Baltimore and Ohio, and Norfolk and Western to give them not absolute control, but control of a majority of the stock ever actually present at a stockholders' meeting.

An examination of this report of the Commission will show that there are certain members of the Pennsylvania board of directors who sit also on the board of directors of the Baltimore and Ohio, the Chesapeake and Ohio, and the Norfolk and Western. There are also certain New York Central directors who sit on those boards. For instance, take the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad. It operates in this way: There are three of the nine directors of the Chesapeake and Ohio who are known as "Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad men;" there are three of them who are known as "Pennsylvania Railroad men," and three of them who are known as "New York Central directors." Now, then, these six directors of the Pennsylvania and of the New York Central not only may, but they actually do, have more to do with fixing the rate on coal and the practices that shall govern in the transportation of coal from West Virginia than any shippers or traffic men who are located along the line of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad. So that the initiative in rate making and the practices that govern transportation in this country are not left to be determined by the persons who ship and the railroad men as they come into contact with each other. Now, take the names of those who constitute the Chesapeake and Ohio directors: Mr. Decatur Axtell, who lives at Richmond; the Hon. CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, who lives at New York; Mr. John P. Green, who lives in Philadelphia; Mr. William H. Newman, who lives in New York or Pennsylvania, certainly not anywhere near the Chesapeake and Ohio; Mr. Prevost, of New York, whose place has since been supplied; Mr. Samuel Rea, of Philadelphia; Mr. George W. Stevens, of Richmond, Va., president of the Chesapeake and Ohio; the Hon. H. T. Wickham, of Richmond, general counsel of the Chesapeake and Ohio, and Mr. H. McK. Twombley, of New York. Of these nine gentlemen only Mr. Stevens, Mr. Wickham, and Mr. Axtell make the interests of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad and the territory it serves their chief interest. Of the others three are chiefly interested in the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and three have the welfare of the New York Central most at heart.

So that the rates and practices of the railroad company in that case are not controlled in the interest even of the stockholders of that road. They are not made with reference solely to the movement of traffic, but they are not infrequently made for the purpose of preventing the movement of traffic. Gentlemen assume that we object to the discriminations practiced by railroad companies that are in the interest of hauling freight. This is not it at all. The complaint of the friends of this measure is directed to those rates and practices which are not merely discriminatory, but which are discriminatory and unjustly so, for the purpose of preventing the movement of traffic and not for the purpose of accelerating it, thereby building up the country and building up the railroad corporation itself.

There is no general complaint throughout this country of rates because they are high. Most people who live along a railroad are not only interested in its prosperity, but know they are. My attitude at least, if I may be personal in this matter, is that of one who deems a railroad company a public agency, and I would no more destroy or hamper a railroad company than I would put an obstruction in the public highway or street in front of my house, because both railroad and highway are public agencies and they ought to have my encouragement. And because they are public agencies I want to see them taken care of. The public are interested more in the prosperity of railroads than that of any other business enterprise. Take a section of country like mine, getting service, as such communities generally do, by one railroad, where the conformation of the country determines where railroads may be built. Railroads in my State can not be built as they can be on the western plains, across the country, but they must follow natural lines marked out by the streams. The result is that a railroad company is in a manner a monopoly, and necessarily so in West Virginia to a large extent. The business, then, of the country along the line is dependent absolutely upon the service rendered by that company. Suppose, for instance, that on such a railroad some great industry should become bankrupt and stop, nobody would be harmed except the owners and creditors and those in the immediate neighborhood. But if a railroad should not be prosperous and it should go into bankruptcy and cease to be operated, everybody along the line would suffer irreparable damage. Even if it should not have sufficient prosperity to get new equipment, build new lines, double track, give better stations, and better sidetrack facilities, and better terminal facilities, all those to be served by it would suffer great injury. The public is interested in the railroads. It may regulate them, and should regulate them with due regard to their prosperity as well as to the public service; and it is in that spirit that the committee have drafted this bill and proposed it to the House.

I deem it unfortunate, Mr. Chairman, that the term "rate legislation" has been applied to this legislation, for while it does adequately describe one purpose of the bill, it calls undue attention to that feature and thus tends to obscure the chief objects which we hope to accomplish. There are relatively not many complaints of rates because they are too high in themselves, but the complaint is usually that the railroads adopt practices which work discriminations. They may, and frequently do, accomplish this purpose by means of relatively unfair rates, even by "rates," so called, which are not intended to make money for the road by charging the rate for moving the freight, but to prevent any shipment of the freight or to prevent its being carried to particular markets.

For instance, if I may recur again to my own section of the country, because I happen to be able there to talk in detail, when the coal roads land the freight at the seaboard, it is $1.35 per ton from one district; but the "rate" is liable to change. It is $1.35 a ton if the vessel on which the coal is loaded goes beyond the capes and up to New England, but if the purchaser or shipper of the coal should load it on a vessel, and that vessel should turn and sail up the bay and come to Baltimore or Washington to compete with the Pennsylvania Railroad, then the "rate" is higher on that coal. When we attempt to reach such a practice we are not after a freight rate; we are after an embargo—an unlawful and discriminatory practice which the railroads have denominated a rate. I take it that a rate is not properly so denominated if made for the purpose of preventing the movement of freight, but only when made for the purpose of promoting the movement of freight.

Now, this bill, Mr. Chairman, seeks to accomplish this purpose in this way: In the first place, we define transportation. We undertake, by a definition of the agencies of transportation, to prevent discrimination as far as possible—to prevent rebates and all forms of unlawful discrimination. One of the most important features of this bill is that definition. The bill says:

The term "railroad," as used in this act, shall include all bridges and ferries used or operated in connection with any railroad, and also all the road in use by any corporation operating a railroad, whether owned or operated under a contract, agreement, or lease, and shall also include all switches, spurs, tracks, and terminal facilities of every kind used or necessary in the transportation of the persons or property designated herein, and also all freight depots, yards, and grounds used or necessary in the transportation or delivery of any of said property; and the term "transportation" shall include cars and other vehicles and all instrumentalities and facilities of shipment or carriage, irrespective of ownership or of any contract, express or implied, for the use thereof and all services in connection with the receipt, delivery, elevation, and transfer in transit, ventilation, refrigeration or icing, storage, and handling of property transported; and it shall be the duty of every carrier subject to the provisions of this act to provide and furnish such transportation upon reasonable request therefor, and to establish through routes and just and reasonable rates applicable thereto.

Now, it has been one of the practices of the carriers of this country when they had formed a combination, to limit the capacity of some of the railroad companies in the combination to carry freight, by limiting the number of cars, and preventing proper arrangements with connecting lines. What was the purpose of that? That does not promote any just and proper interest, or any interest at all, of the railroad so controlled, or its stockholders. It may be for the interest of the dominating road, not because it is a stockholder in the railroad controlled, but only in the way of preventing competition, not by the railroad directly, but by the product to be hauled by the railroad so subjected to the domination of the other.

Why, I know railroads in this country, Mr. Chairman, which, if they could have been compelled to get equipment, if they could have been protected by the compulsion of law against the power of some dominating railroad, would have been compelled by the "individual initiative" of shippers along their line to get the equipment necessary to render adequate service and would have been very much more prosperous than they are now. The assumption that those who are in favor of this measure are hostile to railroads is a mistake. I do not hesitate at any time to say that so far as I am concerned, I am as friendly to the railroad corporations as I am to the large producer or small producer. All we want is that these great public highways should be open to all the people upon equal terms and reasonable terms, so that the great body of the traffic of this country may move as individual initiative and the demands of commerce would permit, free from any improper restriction, whether voluntarily imposed by the railroads, or imposed upon them by some greater corporation. [Applause.]

Section 15 of the bill embodies that provision which the Interstate Commerce Commission in its last annual report said it deemed to be the most important of all, and the one which is most generally noticed by the public in its consideration of this bill. It provides that—

> The Commission is authorized and empowered, and it shall be its duty, whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made as provided in section 13 of this act, or upon complaint of any common carrier, it shall be of the opinion that any of the rates, or charges whatsoever, demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers, subject to the provisions of this act, for the transportation of persons or property as defined in the first section of this act, or that any regulations or practices whatsoever of such carrier or carriers affecting such rates, are unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged.

That has been inserted, Mr. Chairman, not merely because it is demanded by the public, not because the President of the United States favors the proposition, not because some other distinguished public man has favored it, but because almost unanimously the Members of this House who have studied the question believe that the time has come when the traffic of the country, in order to be rendered reasonably free, needs such legislation; and that the railroads themselves, in order to have that protection which they ought to have, against the pressure of combinations of shippers, or against the power of greater railroads, need such legislation.

The Commission, as I said in the earlier part of my speech, did at one time exercise this right——

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. I am deeply interested in the able argument the gentleman is making, and I ask this question simply for information, if the gentleman can spare the time. I would like to have him explain what the words "fairly remunerative" mean in the context of the bill.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I should be glad to give my own opinion of what it means. I said a moment ago that the Supreme Court of the United States has used the expression that the legislative body might not fix rates so low that they would be "confiscatory."

It has also said that the common carrier was entitled to a reasonable return upon its property invested for the service rendered. It has been disputed whether the court meant to say that the railroad could have no relief against a rate fixed by a commission unless that rate amounted to confiscation of property. I myself said that I did not deem a discussion of that question of great importance, for I thought that both expressions "confiscatory" and "compensatory" meant the same thing, because it seems to me to amount to confiscation if a reasonable return on a man's property be taken away from him just as much as if the property were taken itself. But, as stating my own opinion and my own desire to have the words "fairly remunerative" in the bill, I did not wish the railroads of this country, I did not wish the investors of the country to think that there was any intention to be unfair to the railroads or to deprive them of what was a fairly remunerative rate for their services.

If any of us are unwilling that the railroads should be fairly remunerated, it seems to me we are open to the charge, which has been made, of hostility to the railroad interests rather than that we are actuated by a desire to protect the rights of the people; and answering specifically, if I may, the question of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], I think the effect of the words "fairly remunerative" is just this, that if the Commission should at any time, upon complaint, fix a rate so low that it is not fairly remunerative to the railroads, then the courts of the country would have the right to set aside that rate; but if, on the other hand, the Commission upon a case made should fix a rate at what is fairly remunerative, the courts would have no right to interfere with it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell me the difference between "a reasonable and just rate" and "a fairly remunerative rate?" The three words are practically combined in this bill.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I will say that I think there is no difference between "a reasonable and just" and "a fairly remunerative" rate.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. By using the words "fairly remunerative" are we not putting in the bill an expression that no court has ever construed, and putting in what is now and will be a mere "joker," which will clog the law in its practical workings and make lawsuits and ill feeling?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, answering one part of the inquiry of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, I will say most emphatically that I do not think there is any "joker" in this bill. I hope it goes without saying that I would not be an advocate of such a thing if I thought there was anything of that kind in the bill. Neither do I believe any other Member of this House would, and I do not believe the language the gentleman objects to constitutes any sort of a joker. It is a difficult problem that we are putting up to the courts. I admit that. This language will need to be construed. Why, Mr. Chairman, the greatest argument, as I said a moment ago—to my mind the most important argument—used against this bill and any legislation of this sort is the difficulty of it. It is no part of my theory that rate making, or making a law relative to rate making, is an easy proposition; but my answer to that is that difficult as it is to learn, we still must learn it, because the rights of the public and the rights of the great railroad corporations themselves can only be protected and justly regulated by learning the problem. I read at the outset of my speech the language of the Supreme Court where that court uses at one time the word "confiscatory" and where it uses at another time the words "justly compensatory," and I have referred twice, I think, to the confusion that existed on that subject, some people claiming that the railroad was entitled to just compensation, and that that meant fair remuneration for its services, and others claiming that the only protection the railroad could get from the judgment of the Commission under such a law as this would be to enjoin the judgment of the Commission as being "confiscatory;" and we were unwilling to admit, or I was unwilling for myself, let me say, to admit a rule which would be so unfair as to give the railroads less than what was a fairly remunerative rate. I do not regard it as a joker in the bill, but I will tell you how I do regard it. I regard it as one of the things that will enable the great mass of the people of this country to see that this bill was framed and passed in the interest of justice to the shippers and consumers of the country, and that there was no element of determination to be unjust to the great railroad corporations at the same time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from West Virginia yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Certainly, Mr. Chairman, I yield with pleasure to the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee. I congratulate the country that it can hear us both in the same speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the gentleman is making such a good speech I would like to have my name go along with his. [Laughter.] If "reasonable and just" mean the same thing as "fairly remunerative," and the former words have been defined time and time again and the term "fairly remunerative" has never been defined judicially, why does the committee use the term "fairly remunerative?" Why should we not strip the statute of any such undefined, and one might say almost undefinable, term as that? I do not want to take the railroad's property, but I think that "reasonable and just" is all that they are entitled to have.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I am sure the gentleman does not want to take the property of the railroads, and we fix it so that he can not. A court can protect them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Have they not been protected under the term "reasonable and just?"

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Oh, I think they would be protected under that term.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Of course they would.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. But I might put another question which would be just as hard to answer. Why substitute "reasonable and just" for "fairly remunerative?" It is a very easy thing for gentlemen to say that "reasonable and just" are easy terms to define and "fairly remunerative" is a term that has not been defined and that is impossible of definition.

The fact is that all three words are easy of definition, but that when it comes to the application, there is where you have the difficulty. Now, let us see what the Supreme Court said in this case of Smith v. Ames in undertaking to apply the law:

> We hold, however, that the basis of all calculations as to the reasonableness of rates to be charged by a corporation maintaining a highway under legislative sanction must be a fair value of the property being used by it for the convenience of the public—

Now, that is pretty hard to determine, but wait until the explanation comes—

> And in order to ascertain that value the original cost of construction, the amount expended in permanent improvements, the amount and market value of its bonds and stock, the present as compared with the original cost of construction, the probable earning capacity of the property under particular rates prescribed by statute, and the sum required to meet operating expenses are all matters for consideration, and are to be given such weight as may be just and right in each case.

Now, there is a problem. But the court goes on to say:

> We do not say there may not be other matters to be regarded in estimating the value of the property.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STANLEY. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has no control over the time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Do you desire further time?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Georgia very much, and under the circumstances will only use an amount of time necessary to complete my answer to the gentleman's question; probably five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I can probably give you more than that if you desire it.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will you cite any case—English or American——

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I was answering one question of the gentleman from Tennessee, and perhaps both will be so nearly correlated that I will be able to answer them at the same time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am very anxious to find any adjudication, English or American, defining the words "fairly remunerative."

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Why, Mr. Chairman, I might challenge the gentleman to define "reasonable." There is no question of the difficulty of definition, but the difficulty is in the application of the rule under any language, and I have just read the language of the Supreme Court. You take the one question that they suggest as a matter of difficulty, in order to determine what is a reasonable return to a railroad, a comparison of the cost of construction with what it would cost to rebuild the railroad. Now, who is there who can handle that proposition very easily? It is full of difficulties in its application. And when it comes to the language used, "fairly remunerative," it is as easily defined as the word "reasonable."

Mr. STANLEY. Is it not true, and I know the gentleman is an excellent lawyer, that the term "just and reasonable," as used in the context of this bill, has been interpreted by the court; and is it not also true where you use a term that is not interpreted by the court that the people, in a way, must guess how the court will interpret this language? Is it not true that all statutes that are new are, to a degree, not interpreted until they are, in a way, interpreted in the legal phraseology used in the courts, and if that be true does not the gentleman from West Virginia think it is better to use the two words which he thinks are practically synonymous, instead of one which must be subject to judicial interpretation?

Now, I do not mean to intimate, of course——

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I think, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will pardon me, I understand his question. I will apply to this line of inquiry the language of the Supreme Court:

> But it is equally true that the corporation performing such public services and the people financially interested in its business and affairs have rights that may not be invaded by legislative enactment in disregard of the fundamental guaranties for the protection of property. The corporation may not be required to use its property for the benefit of the public without receiving just compensation for the services rendered by it.

Now, says the Supreme Court, and I employ its language to answer all these inquiries directed to the construction of the language of this bill, or to any other language that could be employed:

> How such compensation may be ascertained and what are the necessary elements of such an inquiry will always be an embarrassing question.

As was said in the case last cited, each case must depend on its own special features, and the difficulty that the courts will have, the difficulty that the Commission will have, and the difficulty the lawyers will have who undertake to advise their clients under this law will not be to define the terms "just and reasonable" as used in the statute, or to define the term "fairly remunerative" as used in the statute, but to apply the facts.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from West Virginia yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The gentleman stated a moment ago it was the desire of the committee to make a bill which would be fair not only to shippers, but to carriers?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. That certainly was the desire of the committee and of myself as a member of it.

Mr. BENNET of New York. And I understand the gentleman to say now that there will be more or less difficulty on the part of attorneys advising their clients as to some of the provisions of the bill?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I did not say that there would be any particular difficulty as to the provisions of the bill. What I said was that the difficulty was inherent in the subject-matter, and that could not be eliminated, because it would still remain there. That the law itself, or the bill proposed, was particularly hard to understand I did not say.

Mr. BENNET of New York. That answers the same purpose. Now, I want to ask him, in view of that state of mind and in view of that fact which the gentleman assumes, what is the argument in favor of penalizing an appealing corporation in a condition such as that to the extent of $5,000 a day when there is so much uncertainty?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. The corporation is not to be penalized unless it is violating a continuing order. The trouble is, Mr. Chairman, that some gentlemen take a one-sided view of the question—look at it either entirely from the side of the shippers or entirely from the side of the probable hardships to a railroad company. These orders that the Commission is to make, and which must be obeyed after they have been made thirty days, unless they be suspended, set aside, or modified by the Commission, or set aside or suspended by a court, are not to be made by the Commission except after a full hearing, with notice to all the parties. They are not ex parte rulings. They are the decisions of a public body whose members, although they may understand that their business is to correct violations of a particular law, are yet nevertheless to be presumed generally to do their duty, and do it fairly well—as well as any other public officers.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will my colleague yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES] yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON]?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Now, on the question of confiscation, that I have listened to with so much pleasure, this whole bill is based upon the theory that the Commission can only investigate a challenged rate. Is not that true?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Only the rates that are challenged.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Or complained of?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Or complained of.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Now, there are thousands or rates, and the gentleman admits that the court has the constitutional right when a rate is confiscatory to so declare it. That means that the rate is so low that the railroads or the common carrier can not possibly realize just and remunerative profits?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. That is what I think.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. How can the question of confiscation ever be brought before a court when but one rate has been challenged amidst thousands of other rates that have not been touched? Can the question of confiscation reach them when but one rate is challenged, one rate has been investigated, one rate has been lowered, and thousands of rates of other railroads have not been touched at all? I agree with the gentleman that the court has got the right to pass upon the question of confiscation, but does he think it practicable that the question of confiscation will arise before a court as long as we have restricted the Commission to a challenge of an individual rate?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I see the force of the distinction so ably and clearly drawn by my distinguished colleague on the committee. But my own opinion is that confiscation of the entire property of a railroad company, or of all its revenues, would perhaps be made up of individual confiscatory decisions which are confiscatory with reference to particular rates. I understand what he refers to, however, and that is an additional reason for using the term "fairly remunerative" in this bill; and I am glad that he called my attention to it, for it enables the committee to understand that the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee which proposes to you this bill, while it is attempting to regulate the abuses which have grown up in the matter of transportation in this country, has not at any time intended to be unfair to any interest.

I thank the gentleman very much for the extension of time. [Applause.]

Railroad Rate Bill.

OF

HON. DORSEY W. SHACKLEFORD,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 1, 1906.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission—

Mr. SHACKLEFORD said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The regulation of railroads is one of the most important problems that ever came before Congress for solution. In the performance of this delicate and difficult task we shall have to exercise our clearest judgment, be governed by the strictest fairness, and prompted by the most patriotic motives, or we shall do that for which generations will suffer. Managers of railroads have in so many instances violated the principles of fair dealing and outraged every sense of justice that the indignation of the people has been aroused. Yet we must still be controlled by a spirit of conservatism.

We must realize that, in fact, the railroads belong to the public, and that any injury done to them would be injury inflicted upon the people. No other instrumentality has contributed so much to our commercial greatness and superior civilization as our railroads. Wherever they have extended into prairie wastes or wooded wilderness, gardens and fields have bloomed and fruited, schoolhouses and churches have dotted the valleys and adorned the hills, and the highest civilization has possessed the land. We should not forget the obligation we owe to the bold-spirited capitalists who built our railroads and thus added so much to the development of the country. Then, too, we owe it to the people to refrain from the enactment of repressive legislation tending to check the building of additional railroads. There are yet thousands of miles of railroads needed in this country.

Mr. Chairman, we should also remember the thousands who operate the railroads. They are among the most intelligent, the best, and the bravest of our people. We grow wild with enthusiasm when we contemplate the achievement of Dewey at Manila or of Schley at Santiago. It is proper that we should. But, sir, more gallant still are the brakemen, the firemen, the conductors, the engineers, who, in daylight and in darkness, bravely drive their trains across the continent, carrying the vast commerce of this great people. We should be recreant to our trust if we should do anything here to inflict the slightest injury upon this most worthy and deserving class.

But, sir, above all, we must be true to the great body of the people. We must enact laws which will guarantee to them equality of opportunity and immunity from extortion.

Nobody longer questions the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. Necessarily incidental to this power is that of operating, regulating, and controlling the means and facilities used in the transportation of such commerce.

It is interesting to consider the growth of sentiment in favor of railroad regulation which has taken place in the last ten or twelve years. I wish it were possible to pursue this subject without entering into a discussion of party politics; but it is not. I heard the Speaker say on one occasion that ours is a Government by party. That is measurably true. The parties go before the people on issues and whichever wins is, in a sense, chargeable with the conduct of the Government. Sir, I belong to a party as old as the Union, whose boast is that it contends for measures—not men. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We advocate those measures which we believe would be best for the people; and we feel that we have won when the principles we espouse become the law of the land. We may incidentally regret that we can not also get the offices, but our disappointment in that behalf is reduced to the minimum when we behold the spectacle presented in this House to-day of the solid Republican party and the solid Democratic party standing as one man upon a plank of the Bryan platform. The Democratic platform adopted at Chicago in 1896 contained the following:

> The absorption of wealth by the few, the consolidation of our leading railroad systems, and the formation of trusts and pools require a stricter control by the Federal Government of those arteries of commerce. We demand the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission and such restriction and guaranties in the control of railroads as will protect the people from robbery and oppression.

The Republican platform of that year did not contain a single word upon the subject. Where was Mr. Roosevelt then? In the forefront of the Republican ranks denouncing our platform as anarchy. With the aid of the railroads, the trusts, and consolidated capital the Democrats were beaten.

In 1900 the Democratic platform declared:

> We favor such an enlargement of the scope of the interstate-commerce law as will enable the Commission to protect individuals and communities from discriminations and the public from unjust and unfair transportation rates.

Again the Republican platform was silent on the subject. Again the Republican party, with the aid of the railroads, the trusts, and special interests, triumphed.

In 1904 the Democratic party met in national convention and put into its platform the following plank:

> Individual equality of opportunity and free competition are essential to a healthy and permanent commercial prosperity, and any trust, combination, or monopoly tending to destroy these by controlling production, restricting competition, or fixing prices should be prohibited and punished by law. We especially denounce rebates and discrimination by transportation companies as the most potent agency in promoting and strengthening these unlawful conspiracies against trade.
> INTERSTATE COMMERCE.
> We demand an enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the end that the traveling public and shippers of this country may have prompt and adequate relief for the abuses to which they are subjected in the matter of transportation. We demand a strict enforcement of existing civil and criminal statutes against all such trusts, combinations, and monopolies, and we demand the enactment of such further legislation as may be necessary to effectually suppress them.
> Any trust or unlawful combination engaged in interstate commerce which is monopolizing any branch of business or production should not be permitted to transact business outside of the State of its origin. Whenever it shall be established in any court of competent jurisdiction that such monopolization exists such prohibition should be enforced through comprehensive laws to be enacted on the subject.

Still a third time the Republican platform was as silent as the grave on the subject. Again the Republicans, the railroads, the trusts, the tariff barons, the McCalls, the McCurdys, with the indispensable campaign contributions, under the leadership of Mr. Roosevelt, rode us down, and it seemed our cause was lost forever; but Mr. Roosevelt—always with his ear to the ground—found that the Democratic teachings of those three campaigns had taken such a hold on the mind and conscience of the people that they could not longer be withstood. He determined to change front and do what many another had done before him, pay to virtue the debt he owed to necessity. He sent in his message favoring rate regulation. If he really favored such legislation—if the Republican party really favored it—why was it not enacted ten years ago? The Republicans had the necessary majority. What a triumph for Democracy now to behold a Republican Congress at this late day whipped into passing a measure demanded by the Bryan platform of 1896.

The bill now under consideration was prepared and reported by one of the greatest committees of this House. It bears the name of as able, honest, and patriotic a man as is on this floor—the Hepburn bill. The gentleman from Iowa is a Republican of the strictest sect, with whom I radically disagree on many political and economical questions of the hour; yet I should do myself injustice if I did not in this presence declare it to be my opinion that in industry, training, ability, and devotion to his country he is the peer of any man here. This bill is the result of his best efforts and best judgment. It contains so much of merit that I shall give it my support.

But, Mr. Chairman, while this bill is a long, definite step in the right direction, it stops far short of the goal.

From the beginning of the agitation on this subject it has been my opinion that Congress should enact a comprehensive law giving to the country complete relief from the transportation abuses which have burdened the people and built up the trusts. With that object in view I joined Mr. LAMAR at the last session in the report of the Hearst-Shackleford-Lamar bill. It was far more remedial and thorough than this, as I shall presently show. For reporting that bill both Mr. LAMAR and I have incurred some displeasure and suffered some inconvenience.

It has been said that in reporting the Hearst-Shackleford-Lamar bill we violated a resolution of a Democratic caucus. It is not true. The resolution of the caucus was:

> Resolved, That it is the sense of this caucus that we approve the provisions of the Davey bill.

It was not the Davey bill, but the "provisions" of the Davey bill that were approved. Standing alone, the little, short, naked Davey bill was too rich in poverty and paucity to be offered by a Democratic caucus or a Democratic Congressman as the sum total of what we should enact. As far as they went, though somewhat inaptly expressed, the "provisions" of the Davey bill were sound, and all of them in better form were embraced in the Hearst-Shackleford-Lamar bill. I shall insert as an appendix to these remarks both bills.

It is not true, then, that Mr. LAMAR and I violated the caucus. He who says that we did states that which he knows to be a willfull, deliberate, premeditated falsehood. This statement shall stand as my characterization of any man who shall hereafter make or renew that accusation against me.

In reporting our bill at last session it was my purpose to submit to the consideration of the House some of those provisions which the people of Missouri believe should be contained in any measure having for its object the regulation of railroads. While I was cast down at the rough treatment our bill received at last session—the House leaders not even allowing it to be voted on—I am now correspondingly lifted up at finding many of its provisions rewritten or recast into this, the Hepburn bill.

But, Mr. Chairman, many of the best features of our bill are omitted from this bill.

Our bill of last session contained the following:

> SEC. 2. That the provisions of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, shall apply to all transportation of interstate commerce over any line of railroad and also to such transportation over any part water and part rail route used for through shipment or through carriage.

This would have placed express companies under the superintending control of the Commission. A large part of the commerce of the people is carried by the express companies. Four of the larger express companies have an aggregate capital of $60,000,000. They have 40,000 agencies and 50,000 employees.

Last year they carried 100,000,000 packages of freight, 20,000,000 money packages, and 7,000,000 money orders. If their business were done at reasonable rates it would increase tenfold. The railroads ought to furnish this service themselves; but if they will not, then the express companies, to whom it is farmed out, should be required to do it at reasonable rates. Express companies are common carriers, and no good reason can be assigned why they should not be regulated to the same extent as railroads. Their rates now are very excessive and oppressive. The bill under consideration does not seek to regulate them, and if nobody else does it I shall, at the proper time, offer an amendment to cover that omission.

Another serious omission of this bill is a provision empowering the Commission to inquire into the reasonableness of any proposed advance in rates by a railroad. When a railroad gives notice of an intention to advance any rate, the Commission should have power to investigate the reasonableness of such proposed advance and make a proper order in relation thereto. Under this bill no such power would exist. A railroad could freely raise any rate, and its reasonableness could not be inquired into by the Commission until such rate had gone into effect and been complained against. Suppose the coal trust should stock itself up with coal at Kansas City, and on October 1 the railroads should give notice that on November 1 they would raise rates on coal. No complaint could be made against this rate under this bill until it had gone into effect—November 1. Then it would require thirty days for the Commission to give proper notice to the roads, hear the complaint, and make its finding. This would occupy until December 1. Then the order would not go into effect for thirty days, which would carry it to January 1. The excessive rate would have been in effect from November 1 to January 1, and during that sixty days the coal trust would have had a monopoly in the sale of coal in the middle of winter when the demand was greatest. The Hearst-Shackleford-Lamar bill contained the following:

That when notice of advance in rates, fares, or charges shall be filed with the Commission the said Commission shall have authority to inquire into the lawfulness of such advance and make orders in respect thereof to the same effect as if such advanced rate, fare, or charge were actually in force.

I shall offer to add this by way of amendment to the present bill.

Another grave omission from this bill is want of power of the Commission to make or control classifications of freight. All regulation must fail without this power. If railroads are to keep unregulated control over freight classifications, then they can at any time raise a rate by simply shifting the classification. With full power over classification the most outrageous discrimination can be made in favor of some communities against others. The Commission should have full power over classification and should adopt and enforce a uniform classification throughout the country. The Hearst-Shackleford-Lamar bill of last session provides:

The said Commission may prescribe the form, contents, and arrangement of all schedules of rates, fares, and charges, and it shall be the duty of said Commission to make orders from time to time, as may be practicable, with a view of securing uniformity in freight classification and the use of rate schedules, containing concise and easily understood provisions and regulations.

I shall offer a similar provision as an amendment to this bill.

Another provision of the Hearst-Shackleford-Lamar bill omitted from this is:

Whenever any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall fail or refuse, after reasonable notice, to furnish cars to shippers for the transportation of freight as interstate commerce, or to forward and deliver such freight at destination within reasonable time, such failure or refusal shall be deemed to constitute unjust discrimination and undue and unreasonable prejudice and disadvantage, and in any case or proceeding pending before the Commission or any circuit or district court of the United States based upon such failure or refusal on the part of any such common carrier, proof that in the furnishing of cars or forwarding or delivery of its traffic other shippers have been preferred shall not be required.

This should be added to the present bill by way of amendment. Without some such measure the people will be at the mercy of the trusts. Sir, the coal combination, the steel trust, the Standard Oil trust, owe their very existence to the transportation preferences which they have received. The country is strewn with the wrecks of private fortunes invested in coal mines which could not be operated successfully only because the railroads discriminated against them in furnishing cars and facilities. The law must provide some remedy for this great evil or the trusts will keep their hands clutched on the throats of the people.

Any measure for the regulation of railroads that shall pass here that does not abolish differentials will prove to be a most dismal failure. Everybody agrees that the worst evil in our transportation is discrimination—giving to one shipper or to one community preferential rates not given to others. The favored shipper or favored locality enjoying the preferential rate fattens upon the special privilege, while other shippers and other communities against whom the discrimination is made suffer loss. What is a differential? It is a preferential rate given to a shipper or community; it is a discrimination against everybody except the lucky person or community to whom the preference is given. Differentials can not be eradicated except by the enactment of an unconditional long and short haul clause, and a provision expressly denying the Commission the power to compel a railroad in any case to raise a rate which it has duly filed and published.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Suppose there is a rate from St. Louis through Dallas to Galveston where there is water competition and a rate over the same line from St. Louis to Dallas where there is no water competition. The railroad would have to meet the water competition at Galveston. Does the gentleman contend that the Dallas rate, being reasonable, ought to be reduced to the Galveston rate?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I do. In the first place it is not likely that the Galveston rate is less than reasonable. It is probable that the railroad has put it high enough to afford fair compensation for the service. If the Galveston rate is reasonable, then a higher rate for a shorter distance over the same road to Dallas would be unreasonable and excessive. But even if the Galveston rate were less than a reasonable compensation for the service I should still say the Dallas rate ought to be no higher. While it is true that a railroad is entitled, as a matter of right, to receive reasonable compensation for the service it performs, it is also true that being a public service it must be performed without preference or discrimination. To charge a higher rate from St. Louis to Dallas than is charged over the same line through Dallas to Galveston would be a most wanton discrimination against the people of Dallas. No Dallas man could afford under such conditions to engage extensively in business or manufacture, because he could be undersold and destroyed by his Galveston competitor who had a preferential freight rate. The natural advantages of Dallas would be nullified, her business taken away from her and given to Galveston by railway preference and discrimination. By such a rule all the inland cities of Texas would be made subsidiary to Galveston. How? By an unfair, preferential, discriminating use of the railroads, which are public property, built for the uniform and reasonable use of all of the people on terms of exact equality. Oh, but the gentleman says: "The railroads running into Galveston have got to meet water competition." I challenge the accuracy of that statement. That is an error into which many Members of this House and the Commission have fallen. The railroads do not have to meet water competition. They not only do not have to meet water competition, but they have no right to meet it when to do so requires them to put in less than a reasonably compensatory rate. Will some gentleman state a valid reason why a railroad should meet water competition if to do so would require freight to be carried at a loss?

If railroads and ships were mere private property, as some here seem to think, then the railroads might justify themselves for competing with water transportation at losing rates on the ground that it was done to drive out water competition and secure the business. But the railroads are not in any sense private property, nor is a ship. Both belong absolutely to the public. Then, sir, what shall we say of the public if it shall be found operating its railroads for the purpose of destroying its boats and ships? You ask that there shall be enacted here a law that will permit a railroad to carry traffic to Galveston, Chicago, Buffalo, or to our river points at a rate that will not remunerate it in dollars and cents, the only remuneration being that it drives out water competition. To meet that I believe the law should consider the fact that the railroad has put in a given rate to such water port as conclusive evidence that such rate is fairly and reasonably remunerative, and it should not be permitted to charge any higher rate for any shorter distance over the same line.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I made no such statement. I simply wanted to hear the gentleman's views. He has quoted Judge Prouty. Judge Prouty made this statement before the Senate committee:

Now, I take it that the Congress of the United States may say, with respect to interstate transportation, that in no case should less be charged for a long haul than for a short haul. It would be a very foolish thing to say; it would produce a very disastrous effect upon railways in some parts of this country; but I think Congress might say it, and if Congress did say it, the railways would be obliged to comply with it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Yes, Judge Prouty says Congress has the power to enact the long and short haul clause without limitation, but he also says that Congress ought not to exercise the power.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That is what I say, with certain limitations.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That Congress ought to put it into the power of the Commission to establish and maintain differentials. What is a differential? As construed by the railroads and the Commission, a differential is a permission given to railroads to go into water ports at losing rates and drive out the ships and boats and then make up their losses by charging exorbitant and oppressive rates to intermediate points. Let me submit an example: At one time, under the very eyes of the Commission the rate from New York to Ogden was the full rate from New York, through Ogden, to San Francisco, plus the local rate from San Francisco back to Ogden. Sir, that is a differential. A differential which would be removed by a long and short haul provision, which Judge Prouty thinks Congress has power to enact, but that it would be very foolish to do it. What is the effect of such a differential on the people of Ogden? They can not engage in manufacturing, because their San Francisco competitors have a more favorable rate at which to bring in their raw material and ship out their finished product. So that under this system of differentials, purely artificial and tyrannical, the jobbing business, the manufacturing business of Ogden is destroyed.

Mr. Chairman, for sociological reasons I am opposed to every form of differential. What, sir, is the greatest menace to our country? The congested population of our great cities. Where do you expect to hear of the next alarming disorder, riot, or insurrection? In the peaceful limits of some agricultural section or moderate-sized town? No; but in the crowded streets of some great metropolis, where poverty and vice and crime run riot. What is the influence that has robbed the country and smaller towns of so many of their people and built up the enormous population of our great cities? It has been accomplished by our ill-advised transportation system. I should like to see such conditions prevail that every laboring man and his family could live in a cottage, with a lawn and trees in front and a garden back; where he could have his chickens and cow—where he and his family would be respectable and respected members of the society in the midst of which they lived, instead of going off for employment to some crowded city where he and his family should have to climb three flights of steps from some back alley to find their home in some old rookery.

Take my district, for example. Why is it that factories of one kind and another are not scattered through it at Jefferson City, Columbia, Boonville, Tipton, California, Versailles, Eldon, and other suitable places? Sir, it is because of the accursed differential that gives St. Louis or Chicago better rates. The man who desires to engage in manufacture would rather do it at one of the towns I have named. He could have more reliable and better satisfied labor. He could get his factory site very much cheaper and erect his building for less money. He could get more ground for switches, spurs, and side tracks. Why, then, does he not locate in one of these pleasant and healthful cities? Because, sir, the differential in favor of St. Louis discriminates too severely against them. So it is that the differential renders it necessary that the laboring man must go to the city to find work, where often he falls into that great army of unrest which threatens the peace of our country and the stability of its institutions. Let us abolish absolutely all differentials, and we shall then find our population and our industries disseminated throughout the country. Then love of home, love of country, higher citizenship will grow.

It is contended by some that we should leave the differential to the control of the Commission; let it say whether or not a differential shall be allowed in a given case. "Oh, can not you trust the Commission?" say they. No, Mr. Chairman, we can not trust the Commission. They will be mere human beings with like passions and prejudices as ourselves. They will be subject to the same frailties as other men in other positions. Sectionalism will unconsciously enter into the making up of their judgments. No higher standard of manhood exists anywhere than in this House, yet every Member here from Colorado, where they grow beet sugar, believes there ought to be established and maintained a differential in favor of the sugar grower, even though this special favor placed a special burden on the rest of the people. On the other hand, every Member here from Missouri, where the only use they make of sugar is to buy it and consume it, thinks that the special favor shown the beet-sugar grower is a burden and discrimination against the rest of the people. Both are honest. Put a man on the Commission from Philadelphia, and he will most likely believe that a differential should be maintained that would enable his city to participate in the great commerce of the Mississippi Valley. Put a man on the Commission from New Orleans, and he will think no such differential should exist.

The past record of the Commission is not such as to inspire absolute confidence. I think an examination would show that for every case it has rightfully decided against the railroads it has erroneously decided five against the people. Let us confer upon the Commission all needed power, but let us at the same time define the limits of their power and prescribe the rules under which they shall exercise it.

I voted last year for a law giving power to the Commission to regulate railroads. I shall vote for this bill now; but, Mr. Chairman, when the people have fully studied the question we will have such a system of regulation that the people will not have to go to a paternal commission to secure their rights. Laws will be written upon the pages of our statute books against differentials, against discriminations, against extortion, against overcharges as they are now written against larceny, against burglary, against murder. Penalties will be provided ample to assure enforcement of the law, and whosoever shall violate the law will be arraigned in court and dealt with as any other lawbreaker. Let me show you how we regulate a railroad in one particular out in Missouri. Our law provides that the railroad shall fence its right of way, and that if it shall fail to do so it shall be liable to double the amount of damages that shall result from such failure. This penalty is enforced in court without the aid of any commission. There is scarcely a rod of fence along a railroad in the State that is not up to the lawful standard.

Mr. Chairman, I have said that the railroads already belong to the public. Some seem to regard this as heresy. This is no new doctrine. The constitution of Missouri provides: "All railroads are hereby declared to be public highways." This was but declaratory of what was already the common law of the land. In discussing this the supreme court of Pennsylvania said that a railroad built by authority of the State for the general purposes of commerce is a public highway, and in no sense private property; that a corporation authorized to run it is a servant of the State as much as an officer legally appointed to do any other public duty. Judge Jeremiah Black, the Pennsylvania lawyer and statesman, discusses the question thus:

> It will, I think, be admitted by all persons of average intelligence that the companies are not the owners of the railroads. The notion that they are is as silly as it is pernicious. It is the duty of every commercial, manufacturing, or agricultural State to open thoroughfares of trade and travel through her territory. For that purpose she may take the property of citizens and pay for the work out of her treasury. When it is done she may make it free to all comers or she may reimburse the cost by levying a special tax upon those who use it, or she may get the road built and opened by a corporation or an individual and pay for it by permitting the builder to collect tolls or taxes from those who carry and travel on it. But in all cases the proprietary right remains in the State and is held by her in trust for the use of the people.

On another page he says:

> The functions of railroad corporations are as cleary defined and ought to be as universally understood as those of any servant which the State or General Government employs. Without proprietary right in the highways, they are appointed to superintend them for the owners. They are charged with the duty of seeing that every needed facilities for the use of those thoroughfares shall be furnished to all citizens, like the justice promised in the Magna Charta, without sale, denial, or delay. Such services, if fully performed, are important and valuable, and the compensation ought to be a full equivalent; accordingly, they are authorized to pay themselves by levying upon all who use the road a tax or toll or freight sufficient for that purpose. But this tax must be reasonable, fixed, certain, and uniform, otherwise it is a fraud upon the people which no department of the State government, nor all of them combined, has power to legalize.

There is a correct exposition of the law. Every railroad is the absolute property of the State. Of course, incidentally, those who build and operate them are entitled to a fair return upon their investment and a reasonable compensation for the services they perform. This return and compensation they are to get by levying a tax or charge upon the passengers and freight they carry. Like all other taxes, this must be levied with uniformity and without preference or discrimination. The company operating the road is the servant of the State. Railroads being, then, the property of the State, the remaining question is, How shall the State operate or direct their operation? If any plan can be found by which they can be operated by the corporations who now control them with efficiency, fairness, and equality to the public, then it seems to me that were the best policy. But if it shall be found that all attempts to regulate and control those who operate them shall fail, if no means can be found to compel them to be operated upon reasonable charges and without preference or discrimination, and to furnish to shippers speedy and adequate facilities for the transportation of commerce, then I for one should favor the State taking them over and operating them herself.

The railroad companies make much complaint at the attempts of the Government to in any manner regulate or control their operations. They declare that the railroads are their own private property and they have a right to manage and control them as they choose. They leave nothing undone in their endeavors to defeat any legislation that looks to their regulation. They spend their money freely in the elections to defeat those who do not favor their view. They resort to the most radical and outrageous measures to enable the trusts to despoil the people. The country has become aroused and the people demand relief. In my judgment it were the better policy for the railroad companies themselves to join in an endeavor to secure the enactment of a fair and reasonable law regulating transportation. By opposing such legislation they only make an indignant people more indignant.

If socialism shall ever overspread this country, it will be the result of the misconduct of the possessors of great wealth. Public opinion has determined that the trusts shall be routed from their strongholds. There is not a trust in existence to-day which could have ever grown to proportions making it dangerous to the welfare of the people had it not enjoyed some transportation preferences. No fair-minded man desires to take from any corporation any of its rights. On the other hand, everybody believes that the corporations and other possessors of great wealth should respect the law and the rights of the people. Let the corporations beware. By their lawless course they are calling down vengeance upon their own heads. We hear many railroad men declare that the present agitation for rate regulation is but a step toward the government ownership and operation of the railroads. If that shall ever be consummated, it will be due to the misconduct of the railroad men themselves. Whenever I have been asked whether I favored government ownership of railroads I have always answered that between governmental ownership of railroads and railroad ownership of the Government I am ready promptly to make my choice. I believe the rank and file of the American people feel the same way. It is up to the railroad men to show themselves amenable to the law and ready to be governed by principles of fair dealing. They can not longer stand upon the platform of "The public be damned."

APPENDIX No. 1.

THE DAVEY BILL.

Be it enacted, etc., That when hereafter, upon complaint made and after investigation and hearing had, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall declare a given rate, whether joint or single, or regulation, or practice, for transportation of freight or passengers, unreasonable or unjustly discriminative, it shall be the duty of the Commission, and it is hereby authorized to perform that duty, to declare, at the same time, what would be a fair, just, and reasonable rate, or regulation, or practice in lieu of the rate, regulation, or practice declared unreasonable; and the new rate, regulation, or practice so declared shall become operative twenty days after notice: Provided, That the Commission shall in no case have power to raise a rate filed and published by a carrier.

SEC. 2. That whenever, in consequence of the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, a rate, regulation, or practice has been established and declared as fair, just, and reasonable, and litigation shall ensue because of such decision, the rate, regulation, or practice fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission shall continue as the rate, regulation, or practice to be charged by the carrier during the pendency of the litigation and until the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be held to be error on a final judgment of the questions involved by the United States court having proper jurisdiction, but no proceeding by any court taking jurisdiction shall consider any testimony except such as is contained in the record.

THE HEARST-SHACKLEFORD-LAMAR BILL.

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter when the Interstate Commerce Commission shall, in any case pending before it under the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended and supplemented by other acts of Congress, find that a rate for the transportation of freight or passengers is unreasonable or unjust, it shall determine what would be a reasonable and just rate in such case, and shall order that the rate so found to be reasonable and just shall be substituted for the rate so found to be unreasonable or unjust: Provided, however, That in no case shall the Interstate Commerce Commission have any power to order any carrier to raise any rate which it has duly filed and published.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, shall apply to all transportation of interstate commerce over any line or lines of railroad, and also to such transportation over any part water and part rail route used for through shipment or through carriage.

SEC. 3. That all persons, copartnerships, joint stock companies, associations, and corporations owning or operating, or both owning and operating, any private freight cars or any freight cars not owned by a railroad company, used in interstate commerce, are hereby declared to be common carriers and are hereby made subject to all the provisions, so far as they are applicable, of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto.

SEC. 4. That all terminal facilities, tracks, switches, spurs, freight depots, warehouses, and all facilities used or necessary, and all acts and services performed or necessary in relation to the forwarding and transportation of any interstate commerce and the preservation and safety of the same in transit, are hereby made subject to the provisions, so far as they may be applicable, of the act of Congress to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto.

SEC. 5. That when the rate fixed by the Commission is a joint rate and the carriers parties thereto fail to agree upon the apportionment thereof among themselves within twenty days after notice of such order, the Commission may issue a supplemental order fixing the portion of such joint rate to be received by each carrier party thereto.

SEC. 6. That it shall not be lawful for any common carrier subject to any of said acts, or any company or person acting for or in the stead of such common carrier, to advance, reduce, or cancel any individual or joint rate, fare, or charge now or hereafter in force over the route or line of such common carrier unless or until notice thereof, plainly showing the change intended to be made in such rate, fare, or charge, and the date when the same shall take effect, shall have been filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission and posted in all depots or stations where passengers or freight are received for transportation under such rate, fare, or charge for at least thirty days prior to the date when such change is to become effective: Provided, however, That said Commission may, for good cause shown, upon special application, allow a particular rate, fare, or charge to be changed upon shorter notice published and filed as aforesaid. No joint rate, fare, or charge shall become effective until all carriers named as parties thereto shall have concurred therein by signing the rate schedule or filing general authorization or specific notice of concurrence with the Commission; and any common carrier enforcing any schedule of joint rates, fares, or charges which shall not have been concurred in by all carriers parties thereto, or any schedule of rates, fares, or charges which shall not have been published and filed as required by this section, shall be subject to a forfeiture of $100 for each day such unlawful tariff shall be published or enforced. The said Commission may prescribe the form, contents, and arrangement of all schedules of rates, fares, and charges, and it shall be the duty of said Commission to make orders from time to time, as may be practicable, with a view of securing uniformity in freight classification and the use of rate schedules containing concise and easily understood provisions and regulations.

SEC. 7. That when any notice of advance in rates, fares, or charges shall be filed with the Commission, the said Commission shall have authority to inquire into the lawfulness of such advance and make orders in respect thereof to the same effect as if such advanced rate, fare, or charge were actually in force. The provisions of this section shall also apply to notice of any change in classification of freight or other regulations affecting rates.

SEC. 8. That when in any investigation made by the Interstate Commerce Commission it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Commission that anything has been done or omitted to be done by any common carrier, respondent or defendant, in such proceeding in violation of the provisions of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, or any act amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, or of the provisions of this act, it shall be the duty of the said Commission forthwith to cause a copy of its report in respect thereto to be delivered to such common carrier, together with an order or orders directing such common carrier, its officers and agents, and any receiver or trustee of its property, to wholly cease and desist from such violation, and to establish, put into effect, and maintain such individual rate, fare, charge, relation of rates, fares, or charges, joint rate, fare, or charge, and division thereof, classification of freight articles involved in the proceeding through and continuous carriage over connecting lines or roads, including intersecting switches or connections, and regulations concerning transportation, including the furnishing and apportionment of cars, the provision of other facilities connected with or incidental to transportation, and the receiving, forwarding, and delivery of traffic, as in the judgment of said Commission may be necessary to prevent the continuance in any degree of such violation. That whenever any common carrier, subject to the provisions of this act, shall fail or refuse, after reasonable notice, to furnish cars to shippers for the transportation of freight as interstate commerce, or to forward and deliver such freight at destination within a reasonable time, such failure or refusal shall be deemed to constitute unjust discrimination and undue and unreasonable prejudice and disadvantage, and in any case or proceeding pending before the Commission or any circuit or district court of the United States based upon such failure or refusal on the part of any such common carrier, proof that in the furnishing of cars or forwarding or delivery of its traffic other shippers have been preferred shall not be required.

SEC. 9. That subject to the proceeding in review hereinafter provided every order issued by the Interstate Commerce Commission under the authority of this act shall become effective and be obeyed by the carrier or carriers mentioned in such order on and after the date specified for compliance in such order: Provided, That whenever any such order requires changes in rates, fares, or charges, classification of freight, or regulations affecting the compensation of any carrier, it shall not go into effect until after the expiration of thirty days from the date of service thereof upon the carrier. All orders of the Commission amending or modifying orders previously issued, if made upon application of the carrier, shall become effective as therein provided. The Commission shall have authority at all times to alter, modify, add to, or vacate any order it shall have issued. In case any person, company, or corporation other than a carrier, who may be interested in the traffic or transportation involved, shall be included as a party defendant or respondent in addition to the carrier in a proceeding before the Commission, orders may issue against such additional party in the same manner, to the same extent, and subject to the same provisions as are authorized with respect to carriers.

SEC. 10. That there is hereby created a court to be known as "the court of interstate commerce," which shall consist of three justices, of whom two shall constitute a quorum. Said court shall be a court of record, with jurisdiction as hereafter defined. The justices shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall, unless removed by the President for just cause, hold their offices during good behavior. The salary of each justice shall be $7,500 per year, payable in the same manner as salaries of judges of other courts of the United States. The provisions of section 714 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the retirement of judges of the United States courts, shall apply to the justices of the court of interstate commerce. Such court shall prescribe the form and style of its seal and the form of writs and other process and procedure as may be conformable to the exercise of its jurisdiction. The court shall appoint a clerk, who shall perform and exercise the same duties and powers in regard to all matters within its jurisdiction as are now exercised and performed by the clerk and reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, so far as may be applicable. The salary of the clerk of the court shall be $3,000 a year, payable in the same manner as the salaries of the justices of said court. The court shall have power to establish all rules and regulations for the conduct of the business of the court within its jurisdiction as conferred by law. The court shall have authority to appoint and fix the compensation of such deputy clerks or attendants as it may find necessary to the proper performance of its duties. The salaries of the officers and all the expenses of the court, including all necessary expenses for transportation incurred by the justices of the court, or by the marshal, or clerk, or any deputy clerk, or attendant of the court, upon official business in any other place than in the city of Washington, shall be allowed and paid out of the appropriation for salaries and expenses of the courts of the United States upon presentation of itemized vouchers therefor. The general sessions of the court shall be held in the city of Washington, but whenever the convenience of the public may be promoted, or delay and expense prevented thereby, the court may hold sessions in any part of the United States. The court shall be furnished by the Attorney-General of the United States with suitable offices and all necessary office supplies.

SEC. 11. That said court of interstate commerce shall have exclusive jurisdiction to review all orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission and summarily to enforce performance thereof by writs or other proper process. The said court shall also have exclusive jurisdiction in all proceedings brought by or upon the request of the Interstate Commerce Commission under section 3 of an act to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States, approved February 19, 1903. The said court shall also have exclusive and all necessary jurisdiction to enforce, upon the petition of the United States or of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the requirements of the act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887, and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, in respect of the filing and publication of schedules of rates, fares, and charges of common carriers subject to the provisions of said acts. Disobedience of any order, writ, or other process of said court shall constitute contempt of said court, punishable by a fine payable into the Treasury of the United States of $5,000 for each offense, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and such imprisonment. Every distinct violation of any such order, writ, or other proper process of said court shall be a separate offense, and each day of the continuance of such violation shall be deemed a separate offense.

SEC. 12. That any party to a proceeding before the Interstate Commerce Commission aggrieved by an order of said Commission may, within thirty days after issuance of such order, file with said court a petition for review. Upon the filing of such petition it shall be the duty of the clerk of the said court to serve a copy thereof upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, and after service of such copy of petition upon the Interstate Commerce Commission it shall be its duty within twenty days thereafter to cause to be filed in said court a duly certified copy of the entire record in connection with the order to be reviewed, including the petition, answers, testimony, report, and opinion of the Commission, its order, and all other papers in connection therewith. Said court shall thereupon, as speedily as may be, proceed to review the order appealed from as to its justness, reasonableness, and lawfulness upon the said record returned by the Commission, and thereupon, if, after hearing the parties, said court shall be of the opinion that such order is unjust, unreasonable, or unlawful, it shall modify, set aside, or annul the same by appropriate decree or remand the cause to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a new or further hearing; otherwise the order of said Commission shall be affirmed. Pending such review the said court may, upon application and hearing, if in its opinion the order under review is clearly unjust, unreasonable, or unlawful, suspend said order.

SEC. 13. That the defense in such proceedings in review, except as to orders of the Commission dismissing an application or petition, shall be undertaken by the Attorney-General of the United States, and the costs and expenses of such defense shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expense of the courts of the United States. The Commission may, with the consent of the Attorney-General, employ special counsel in any such proceeding, paying the expense of such employment out of its own appropriation.

SEC. 14. That if any party bound thereby having failed to file petition for review within the time hereinabove specified shall refuse or neglect to obey or perform any order of the Commission while same is in force, or having filed such petition for review shall refuse or neglect to obey or perform any order of the Commission as modified or affirmed by said court upon review as aforesaid, obedience and performance thereof shall be summarily enforced by a writ of injunction, attachment, or other proper process; and it shall be lawful for such court, upon petition of said Commission, or of any party interested, accompanied by a certified copy of the order alleged to be violated and evidence of the violation alleged, to issue a writ of injunction, or other proper process, restraining such common carrier from further continuing such violation or disobedience of such order or requirement of said Commission and enjoining obedience to the same; and in case of any disobedience of any such writ it shall be lawful for such court to issue writs of attachment, or any other proper process, against such common carrier, and if a corporation, against one or more of the directors, officers, or agents of the same, or against any owner, lessee, trustee, receiver, or other persons failing to obey such writ or other proper process.

SEC. 15. That the decisions of said court shall be final, and no appeal therefrom shall lie unless, in the opinion of the said court, a constitutional question is involved which ought to be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States, or unless the Supreme Court of the United States, upon it appearing to its satisfaction that a constitutional question is involved in said decision which ought to be reviewed in the Supreme Court, issues a writ of certiorari directed to the clerk of said court to transmit the record in such case to the Supreme Court for review. In the Supreme Court such case shall take precedence over all other proceedings except criminal cases. During the pendency of any appeal to the Supreme Court neither the order of said court nor the execution of any writ of process shall be stayed or suspended. The defense in all such appeals in the Supreme Court, except appeals from orders affirming an order of the Commission which dismisses an application or petition, shall be undertaken by the Attorney-General of the United States, and the costs and expenses of such defense shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States. The Commission may, with the consent of the Attorney-General, employ special counsel in any appeal to or review by the Supreme Court, paying the expense of such employment out of its own appropriation.

SEC. 16. That in case of disobedience to a subpœna the Commission, or any party to a proceeding before the Commission, may invoke the aid of said court of interstate commerce in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents, under the provisions of the act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, and in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna issued to any common carrier subject to the provisions of said acts, or other person, said court may issue an order requiring such common carrier or other person to appear before said Commission (and produce books and papers if so desired) and give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court shall be punished by such court as a contempt thereof in the same manner as hereinabove provided for disobedience of other orders of said court amounting to a contempt thereof.

SEC. 17. That it shall be the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to proceed expeditiously with the trial and determination of all cases brought before it, and to render a decision in each case within sixty days after the cause has been finally submitted.

SEC. 18. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed: Provided, That such repeal shall not affect causes now pending in court, and such causes shall be prosecuted to a conclusion in the manner heretofore provided by law. All existing laws relative to testimony in cases or proceedings under or connected with the act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto shall also apply to any case or proceedings authorized by this act.

SEC. 19. That this act shall take effect from the date of its passage.

Liability of Employers.

OF

HON. JACK BEALL,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, April 2, 1906,

On the bill (H. R. 239) relating to liability of common carriers by railroads in the District of Columbia and Territories and common carriers by railroads engaged in commerce between the States and between the States and foreign nations to their employees.

Mr. BEALL of Texas said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I desire to-day to congratulate the 2,000,000 railway employees in this country, and those dependent upon them, that they have at last forced this House to give some heed to their demands. The gentlemen who are here representing the great labor organizations and who a few days ago bearded the President in his den, and corralled the Speaker of this House in that rear lobby, and made it plain to them that organized labor was tired of legislative trifling and parliamentary "shell games," are probably largely entitled to the credit for this bill being considered at this time. For session after session the men who take their lives in their hands in the service of the railways of this country have been asking for this relief, but while in party conventions its perspiring orators have prated about the dignity of labor, and its candidates have appealed to workingmen for their support, and its President has sent in messages moistened with tears in their behalf, my observation here has been that in doing these things the Republican party has been playing a part, and under its reign the man who labors is in truth and in fact the "forgotten man." But the passage of this bill by this House is but scant assurance that it will ever become a law. It goes from here to the Republican Senate, whose ear is but poorly attuned to hear the pleadings of those who labor.

For many years the millions of workingmen of this country have been beseeching Congress to give them some measure of relief against hard and unjust conditions. An instance of this is found in the abuse of judicial power involved in the issuance of unjustifiable and unnecessary injunctions in labor disputes, but so far their appeals have been in vain. In this Congress bills of this character have been introduced and are now sleeping in the committee graveyards of this House. It is useless for any man to attempt to disguise the real situation. Under the rules of this House, if the leaders of this majority want any of these bills enacted into law, they have the power to do so. If the Speaker of this House favors a single one of these bills for the protection of labor, he can force its passage. If he should manifest the same zeal in their behalf as he has displayed in outraging the people of Arizona in the statehood contest, every measure in which labor is interested can be reported and passed at this session of this Congress.

I submit that in a government such as ours is supposed to be no man can justify the refusal of Congress to give prompt and courteous consideration to every measure presented here in behalf of the many millions of men who have done and are doing so much to make this country great. But gentlemen may say that some of these demands are extreme and radical. This offers no adequate reason for the long-continued refusal of the majority to consider them. If they are justly subject to this charge, it is within the power of this House to remove the objectionable features and make them conform to what is right and reasonable

The men who are urging these measures upon Congress at this time are intensely in earnest. They are men of intelligence and reason; they are not intentionally seeking to destroy the commerce of this country or any of the agencies by which it operates. They are not hostile to the legitimate interests of the railroad companies. The prosperity of the railroads means or should mean continued prosperity for them.

This House may not agree with them upon every detail of these bills they urge, but they are not quibbling about petty details. They ask simply for a day in court to present their grievances and to submit their plan of relief. This House owes to them the courtesy to give fair consideration to what they propose.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the bill now under consideration should pass. I understand it to involve three propositions, all of which I heartily favor, and to two of which I desire to submit some observations. First, it abolishes the follow-servants' doctrine as applied to railroad companies and their employees; second, it modifies the doctrine of contributory negligence so as to submit to a jury the question of damages where the negligence of the party injured is slight and the negligence of the company is gross; third, it nullifies the contracts which employees are forced to sign before receiving employment, releasing the railroad company from liability in case of injury.

If there ever existed an adequate reason for the doctrine that a master should not be liable for an injury suffered by a servant by reason of the negligence of a fellow-servant, that reason no longer obtains in the railway service of this country. It had its origin at a time when conditions were wholly different from those of to-day; when there were comparatively few engaged in any line of work where the negligence of one would probably cause injury to another; when each servant had the same and perhaps better opportunity than the master to acquaint himself with the character and habits of his fellow-workmen; when the machinery used was crude and simple and slow moving and its dangers apparent. Now everything is changed. The railroads of this country are operated upon a most gigantic scale. One employee may never know nor see a fellow-employee upon whose care his safety and life may depend. The machinery of to-day is driven by the power of steam at lightning speed, and danger and death lurk everywhere. Amidst such conditions it is beyond a possibility for an employee to protect himself against the carelessness of a fellow-employee, as was formerly the case. To say that he must is to legalize an anachronism that is condemned by reason and judgment. This fellow-servants' doctrine has been entirely abolished in many foreign countries and in many States of this Union, and has been largely modified in many others. In some States the old worn-out doctrine is applied in all its rigor and unreasonableness. It ought to be abolished in all grades of railway service.

Now, as to the doctrine of contributory negligence. If you were to submit to a man of good heart and sense, not professing a knowledge of the law, the question as to whether or not a railway employee should recover when injured through his own slight negligence and the gross negligence of the company, I venture the statement that the reply would be that recovery in some amount should be had, but so far have the niceties and the refinements of the law gone that except where modified by statute a person so injured has no right of recovery. In other words, the hard and inhumane rule has prevailed that a railroad company is exempt from liability for damages for injuries inflicted upon one of its employees through its own gross negligence if such employee, at the time of such injury, was also guilty of any degree of negligence that proximately contributed to his injury. To such an extent has this doctrine been carried in some of the States that, in connection with the doctrine of assumed risk that has also been enforced with such unrelenting severity, it is almost impossible for an employee to recover for any character of injury inflicted through the confessed negligence of the company.

It is said that a railway employee injured by the combined negligence of himself and the company should not recover of the company. Why? Because, it is said, he was himself negligent. But the company was also negligent. Ought it to be wholly exempted from the effects of its negligence because its employee was also negligent? If the company is not guilty of negligence, the employee is not permitted to recover, though he himself may have been guilty of no negligence and yet have suffered injury. It is no more just to permit a railroad company to relieve itself from all liability for injuries for which it was partially responsible than it would be for an employee to place all the liability upon the railroad company for an injury for which he was partially responsible. A fairer rule would be to make each party bear that part of the burden caused by the negligence of such party.

This bill does not go to this extent, however. It simply says to a railroad company: "If you are grossly negligent and your employee is slightly negligent, and if, as a result of your gross negligence and his slight negligence combined, your employee is injured or killed, then you must respond in damages in proportion to your negligence."

The employee can not secure full compensation for his injuries against the company, because his own act of negligence is counted against him. The railroad company can not wholly escape liability, for its gross negligence is counted against it. As the employee was negligent, so his damages are diminished. As the railroad company was negligent, accordingly its liability is determined.

If it be said that such a rule will encourage carelessness among employees, it is a sufficient answer to say that employees are not likely to subject themselves to injury in order to prosecute a suit for damages against the railroad company. Would the proposed rule encourage carelessness among employees so much as the old rule did among employers? In one case the employee might recover damages, but to do so he must suffer the physical pain and danger, while under the old rule the company suffered no injury, but still was exempted from any liability.

No, Mr. Speaker, the passage of this bill will not cause railway employees to be more negligent, but it will force railroad companies to be more careful. During the past year 50,000 railway employees were killed or injured in the United States. This bill will not relieve employees from the consequences of their own negligence. If injured, they must suffer the physical pains and face the risk of death, and, in addition, when a jury comes to strike the balance, their own negligence will be counted against them.

A railroad company can suffer no physical pain. It never dies. The only compensation it can make to one of its employees whom it has injured through its gross negligence is to pay just damages to him, making such employee bear any consequences of his own negligence. This much the employee should bear, but it is unjust to impose upon the employee all the consequences of his own negligence and that of the railroad company too.

I am moved by no spirit of hostility to railroad companies. I join in no unreasoning clamor against them. They have been and are great instrumentalities in the development of our country. Before the people, in the court room, and in the halls of legislation they should be accorded the fullest measure of justice. Their rights should be as sacredly respected as the rights of the individual, but the humblest employee should be equally protected.

If it be true—and it is—that in legislation the man should not be favored in detriment to the rights of the corporation, it is equally true that the corporation should never be favored as against the man. In my opinion the creature of flesh and blood, with brain and nerves and heart, to whom God gave the breath of life, should be respected and protected by the law as much as the artificial man created by the puny arm of the statute. This bill protects both.

Fortifications Appropriation Bill.

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. JONES,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 13, 1906.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 14171) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes—

Mr. JONES of Virginia said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Until the policy of our Government toward the Philippine Islands is definitely settled, it will be impossible for Congress to legislate intelligently with reference to the question now under discussion. If it be the purpose of the United States to hold permanently and govern indefinitely the Philippine Islands, I should unhesitatingly say that Cavite would be the best place to be selected for a naval station and supply base. If, on the other hand, the policy of the United States is to grant the Filipino people their independence, then, in my judgment, some other point in the Philippine Islands ought to be selected for the naval station, the construction and fortification of which is now proposed.

Everybody who knows anything about the Philippine Islands knows that if we are to hold them permanently we must hold and fortify against attack the city of Manila. The possession of Manila is absolutely essential to the possession and control of the Philippine Archipelago. I think, however, Mr. Chairman, that I perceive in the settled purpose of our military and naval authorities to establish this naval station at Olongapo, in Subig Bay, an indication that the Administration and the Republican party intend, at some not far distant day, to relinquish control over the Philippines and grant to the Filipinos their independence. Acting upon that theory, I should be inclined to favor a naval station at Olongapo, notwithstanding the many and valid objections which, in my opinion, are to be urged against that location, so anxious am I to hasten the hour when we shall withdraw from the Philippines, both for their and our own good. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] has told us a good deal about Subig Bay and the conditions that exist there. He admits he has no personal knowledge as to the situation, and even declares that he has no desire ever to see the islands. His only knowledge consists in what he has been told. If, then, he has given us the benefit of all that other people have told him upon this subject, he most certainly has not told half the story. There is not, Mr. Chairman, in my humble judgment, 5 acres of level ground bordering upon Subig Bay suitable for the location of a naval station. The only level ground that I know of there is at the point where, I believe, it is proposed to construct this naval station. It is a low, marshy piece of ground, very limited in extent, and only 2 feet above sea level, so that in order to secure the solid and level ground upon which to build a naval station at that point—and it is the only point on the bay where one can be built—it will not only be necessary to cut down the side of a mountain that rises abruptly out of the bay, but it will also be absolutely necessary to raise the little level ground now available by placing upon it material which must be dredged from the bay in order to secure a sufficient depth of water to accommodate our ships. In addition to that, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. In a moment. In addition to this, Mr. Chairman, there is a stream rushing down the side of that mountain and dashing across the very spot where the naval station is to be located, or rather where it is proposed to locate it, so that before the work of building a site for this station is begun it will be necessary to divert the course of that stream so as to carry the water in some other direction. Mr. Chairman, there is still another objection to Olongapo, which I have not yet heard alluded to. It is a fact known of everybody who knows anything about conditions in those islands that the fall of water at Olongapo far exceeds that at Cavite or at any other point in that section of Luzon. It is, indeed, quite phenomenal. It rains there every day of the year, and when it rains it pours in torrents, so that it will require the expenditure of a great deal of money merely for protective works, even after the station has been established at an enormous expenditure.

Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary that a naval station should be established at Olongapo even if it should be admitted that Cavite is not a suitable place. There is a bill pending here now, introduced at the instance of the Secretary of War and earnestly supported by him, the purpose of which is to enable the United States to acquire certain coal lands on the island of Batan, the only island in all the archipelago where it has been absolutely and certainly ascertained that a sufficient supply of good coal can be procured to meet the demands, present and prospective, of our Army and Navy in the Philippines—coal that must be had in the deplorable event that we become involved in war in the Far East.

The island of Batan lies on the eastern side of the archipelago. It is within 50 miles of the Straits of San Bernardino, which straits are the gateway to the Philippine Islands from San Francisco. At the island of Batan there is a splendid harbor, and we are told by one of the officers of the Army who has been there for two years and who has thoroughly investigated the situation that there are 17 fathoms of water in the harbor, and that a ship drawing 32 feet of water can lie now within a hundred yards of the shore.

Mr. GROSVENOR. May I suggest to the gentleman whether it is not true also that the location of this place, this magnificent harbor, is midway, as it were, between the Manila end of the archipelago and the Suez Canal, which places it in immediate connection with the travel going from the canal to the oriental countries?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The island of Batan is on the eastern side of the archipelago, and it is directly, or almost so, on the shortest line of travel between San Francisco and Manila. The shortest and most direct route between San Francisco and Manila is through the San Bernardino Straits, and Batan is within 50 miles of the entrance of those straits. This route is several hundred miles shorter than that around the northern end of Luzon, the route followed only because of the present necessity of coaling in Japan. Batan is about 500 miles from Manila. It is, as I have said, the only place in the islands where it is possible, so far as the War Department knows, to secure the coal which, in the event of war, we shall be absolutely obliged to have in order to hold the islands. If Olongapo is to be the location of the naval station, there being no coal in that immediate neighborhood, or anything else for that matter, we would have to maintain an uninterrupted communication of 500 miles between the station and Batan in the event of war. A declaration of war would mean, of course, the closing to us of the ports of Japan and that of Hongkong, where our Army transports now procure their coal.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if we are going to select a naval base in the Philippine Islands, all other things being equal, there being as good a harbor at this point as there is at Olongapo, and it being capable of being just as easily fortified as Olongapo, as shown by the testimony of an Army expert, we should select the island of Batan, where we have a practically inexhaustible supply of coal. Olongapo has no single advantage over Batan, whilst there are many, in my opinion, to be cited in favor of the latter, not the least of which is an ample supply of coal, which certainly in time of war is not to be dispensed with. But my position is that until the United States have settled what their future policy as to the Philippines is to be, until we know whether it is the purpose of the Administration to retain the islands permanently or at some future time to give to them their independence, Congress ought not to go ahead and appropriate millions of dollars for the establishment of a naval station in those islands. As has already been said by the gentleman from New York, we have a well-equipped navy-yard at Cavite, which is now doing a great deal of work, and which has met all the requirements of our naval establishment in the Orient up to the present time.

Mr. RIXEY. I would like to ask my colleague a question. Does not my colleague think that Manila is really the key to the Philippine Islands, and that it is necessary to protect Manila in order to hold the islands; and if so, does he think that a naval basis and fortification 500 miles away will answer the purpose of protecting Manila?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I will answer my colleague in this way: I have already said that if we propose to keep the Philippine Islands permanently, Manila being, as he says, the "key to the situation," the naval station should be at Cavite; but I have also said that if such is not to be the policy, and a naval station for that reason is to be located at some other point, the weight of argument was in favor of the island of Batan against Subig Bay. If it be the purpose of the United States to retain these islands permanently, then I concede that Cavite ought to be the location of a navy-yard, since it is necessary to fortify Manila Bay in order to hold Manila. If we lose Manila, we must lose the whole Philippine Islands.

Mr. RIXEY. Now, will my colleague allow another question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I am asked by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] to say something as to the quality of coal which can be obtained on the island of Batan. Some two years ago an agent of the Government obtained an option upon certain coal fields in the island of Batan, and since then an expert selected by the War Department has been mining and testing the coal, which is found there in large quantities. His testimony is that while that coal is not equal to the Pocahontas coal used now by the Navy, it is superior to any other coal in the Orient—superior to that which we are buying now and using in our transports, and, in his judgment, superior to any other likely to be found in the Philippine Islands.

It is the earnest desire of the Secretary of War that authority shall at once be given to acquire these coal fields, so that in the event of war, when our Navy will be cut off from every other source of supply in the Orient, and when our communications between the Philippine Islands and the Pacific coast may be seriously interrupted, we may not lack for an ample supply of coal, which, whilst not equal to that now used in the ships of our Asiatic fleet, could nevertheless be used in time of war and when the product of our American mines was not accessible.

This coal would not be used by the Navy Department in time of peace, even if we were to mine it now, because our naval authorities are of the opinion that its use is injurious to the boilers of our ships; but in the event of war it would be our only source of supply outside of the United States, and then its use would be an absolute necessity. Therefore it is that the Secretary of War is even now urging that this coal be secured. The Committee on Insular Affairs has reported this bill to the House, and it is now on the Calendar.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will ask the gentleman if it will not, in his opinion, be necessary for the Government to fortify the harbor on the east side of the island of Batan anyway in order that it may avail itself of this coal supply in possible exigencies?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. That is a fact, Mr. Chairman. If we want to preserve these coal fields after we get them, of course we will have to fortify the approaches thereto, and the expert testimony is to the effect that they can be easily fortified.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We would have to have a fortification there, so as to make certain a continuous supply of coal in the event of war.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. That is absolutely true.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the size of the Government reserve adjacent to this coal land which it is proposed by your committee to purchase, underlying which Government reserve there is a body of coal?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The island of Batan is a very small one, about 10 miles long and about 5 miles wide, and the whole of it is underlaid with coal. The Spanish concession, which it is desirable that the Government shall purchase, covers only about 300 acres of the island.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the size of the Government reserve lying adjacent to that concession?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. All the remainder of the island. The Government has reserved as a military reservation the remainder of the island.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the Government wants to avail itself of the coal upon that island, is it absolutely essential that we pay $50,000 for this 300 acres of land?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. It is not absolutely essential, Mr. Chairman, but it is the best business proposition in the world, because these 300 acres are contiguous to the deep water, and you can not approach from deep water any other part of the island except through or over these 300 acres.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman believe that the Government of the United States ought to enter upon the coal business, or does he believe that it should buy for $50,000, or any other amount, these coal lands for the purpose of allowing some private corporation to develop the land on condition that the Government enter into a contract with that private corporation for the purpose of furnishing coal to the Government of the United States, in order that the corporation may have a profitable business after the Government takes all the risk and invests the necessary money?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I understand the gentleman's question. My proposition is not at all involved in that question. The proposition embodied in the bill reported by the Insular Affairs Committee is not that the Government shall work these mines, nor that it shall lease them, but it is simply and solely to close the option which was obtained two years ago, and which will expire on the 1st day of March next.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seventeen minutes remaining.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The bill which was prepared, I believe, by the War Department, provided for the lease of these coal lands; but the Committee on Insular Affairs did not believe it wise to permit their lease to private parties and therefore struck out of the bill everything relating to a lease. The committee felt that it was wise to authorize the closing of the option, which expires on the 1st day of March. When it was given it was not known certainly that coal existed in large quantity on the island, nor had its quality been ascertained definitely. Now we know the coal is there, and that it is of a superior quality to any thus far found in the Orient. It has cost considerable to make these investigations, and now that we are satisfied both as to the quantity and quality of the coal it would be a great mistake, in my judgment, not to take up the option we have.

It is true that we already own the most extensive part of the coal lands on the island; but, as I have endeavored to make plain, the claims covered by this option lie contiguous to deep water, facing a splendid harbor, and completely shutting us out from deep water, so that it would cost us far more to ship our coal, on account of its inaccessibility to deep water, than it will now cost to take up this option. As a plain business proposition we should acquire this Spanish concession, for without it our valuable holdings can not be economically utilized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is not a purchase of land, but of mining claims, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. That is true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Did the gentleman's committee examine the report of any official in which it was held that these alleged mining claims were valid?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The Secretary of War appeared before the committee, and stated that the question of title had been submitted to the best legal authorities in the Philippine Islands, and that the War Department was absolutely satisfied that the title was good.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Considering the statements that have been made by the administration as to the lack of capacity on the part of the Filipinos to govern themselves, does the gentleman believe that the statement of the best legal advice in the Philippine Islands is such that it ought to satisfy anyone that these claims are valid?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I am of the opinion, Mr. Chairman, that the president of the supreme court of the Philippine Islands, Judge Arrelano, is the best lawyer in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But this matter was not submitted to the court.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. It was not submitted to the court, but it was submitted to the legal advisers of the government in the islands, to lawyers thoroughly conversant with the subject and capable of advising in relation thereto. I have a very high opinion of many of the Filipino lawyers.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The Secretary of War stated in addition that the investigation of the title of this particular land had occupied a year and a half perhaps, and, in addition to the ablest counsel they could get there they had the services for a number of months of one of the ablest American mining lawyers, one who had spent twenty years in the practice in the State of Colorado, a man thoroughly familiar with the mining laws of this country and of Spain, and it was the unanimous judgment of these persons that the Spanish claimants had a perfect title to that land.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the mining title they had, could they prevent access to the water from over their land?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. No; but it would be very costly to build a road over this concession to the harbor.

But, Mr. Chairman, the point I make is this, we have now the only coal in the Philippine Islands, so far as anybody knows, which would be available in the case of war with a foreign country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will ask the gentleman from Iowa if he will yield to the gentleman from Virginia three minutes. I have promised all of my time.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, whether we acquire this small concession or not, we own the island of Batan, and it has been reserved as a military reservation. There is adjacent to that island one of the very finest harbors in the Philippines. It is on the eastern coast of the archipelago and almost immediately on the shortest and most direct route between Manila and San Francisco. It can be as easily fortified as Olongapo. Why, then, should Olongapo be selected as the site of a naval station rather than this island? If Cavite is to be abandoned and another location selected, what, if any, advantage has Subig Bay over the island of Batan?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Does the gentleman think, in view of the conflicting testimony of gentlemen who know all about the matter—and I know nothing about it—that this body is the proper body to decide where the navy-yard ought to be in the Philippines?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I am glad, Mr. Chairman, that that question was asked me. I do not believe that this body now possesses sufficient information to enable it to properly or intelligently say where there shall be a naval station established or what particular place should be fortified. But I do not believe that either the War or the Navy Department should be permitted to go ahead and select the location for a navy-yard, which will probably cost $30,000,000, without consulting Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. But you have invested $119,000,000 in the continental United States in that way, have you not?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Yes, in constructing fortifications; but the location of naval stations is a different proposition. The gentleman knows, as well as I do, that notwithstanding the report of the Army and Navy Board, there is a great diversity of opinion among military and naval people as to whether or not Subig Bay is the proper location for our naval station in the Philippines. I am informed that General Wood, now in the Philippines, does not favor the selection of Olongapo. I am prepared also to state that General Corbin, our commander in the Philippine Islands, although a year ago he favored the selection of Olongapo, has revised his opinion and now does not think it is a suitable place.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has again expired.

Liability of Employers.

OF

HON. WILLIAM. A. RODENBERG,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, April 2, 1906,

On the bill (H. R. 239) relating to liability of common carriers by railroads in the District of Columbia and Territories and common carriers by railroads engaged in commerce between the States and between the States and foreign nations to their employees.

Mr. RODENBERG said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I regard the provisions of this bill as highly meritorious and in full harmony with that newer and truer sense of justice which the enlightened sentiment of this day and generation is endeavoring to embody in all our industrial relations. The common-law rule of liability, which prevents a recovery of damages for the personal injury or the death of an employee caused by the negligence of a fellow-servant, and also the rule of common law which makes contributory negligence a defense to claims for such injuries, violate every principle of justice and humanity and should have been abolished years ago. The doctrine of fellow-servant, which had its origin in England as far back as 1837, and which has been generally followed by the States of this Union, has no place in the economy of modern civilization. It is not in keeping with the progressive spirit of the times. It is a travesty on justice and subversive of every consideration of equity and individual right.

We are wont to boast of our superior civilization, of the humanity of our laws, and of the progress of our people along material lines, and yet we are confronted to-day with the fact that among all of the great industrial countries of the world the United States is the only one which has so far failed to enact legislation which is intended to secure simple justice for those of our fellow-citizens who are engaged in the hazardous employment of railroading. England, which originated this doctrine of fellow-servant, repudiated it in 1880 by the passage of an employers' liability law, under the provisions of which railway companies were held responsible for injuries sustained by an employee in charge of any railway engine, switch, or signal, or resulting from carrying out an improper order of a superior official. And nine years ago the English Parliament supplemented this humane legislation by the passage of what is known as the "workmen's compensation act," which extends the beneficent provisions of the employers' liability law to practically every hazardous occupation.

A similar law, enabling workmen in dangerous occupations to recover for injuries caused by the negligence of their fellow-employees, has been in existence in Germany for a third of a century, and in 1884, when the masterful Bismarck was at the zenith of his power, the German Reichstag passed a compulsory insurance law, under which the employer must insure his employees in the more dangerous occupations against death or permanent disability, notwithstanding the fact that the injury resulting in death or disability may be directly attributable to the negligence of a fellow-employee. Austria, Norway, Denmark, Italy, France, Spain, and Roumania have each followed the lead of Germany and enacted similar compulsory insurance laws.

Under the Napoleonic code, which also obtains in Belgium and Holland, the French employer is held responsible in damages for all injuries sustained by his employees. Sweden and Switzerland are in accord with the other countries of Europe, and have long since abolished the doctrine of fellow-servant and contributory negligence. Even Russia—benighted, cruel, despotic Russia, with a record of brutality, oppression, and inhumanity unparalleled in all the annals of history—even Russia has provided in her civil common law that the employer shall be held responsible for the negligence of his employees, and he can escape this responsibility only upon proving that the accident was due to unavoidable causes or to the gross negligence of the victim himself.

In fact, all of the countries of Europe have long since enacted favorable legislation on this question which is of such vital importance to the great army of toilers. Among all the great civilized powers of the world the United States alone enjoys the unenviable distinction of having failed up to this time to enact any national legislation on this important subject. It is true that a number of the States have passed laws greatly modifying the severity of the doctrine of fellow-servant, and some have had the good sense to abolish it entirely so far as it relates to railroad employment. But no law on this subject has ever been written in the Federal statutes by the Congress of the United States. I contend that the time has come when a uniform rule of liability throughout the Union with reference to common carriers should be adopted, and I hope the day is not far distant when the American Congress will extend the protection of this humane rule to all workingmen engaged in hazardous employment of every description.

It will be contended by the opponents of this measure that its passage will result in a multiplicity of damage suits, which in turn will work a serious hardship on the railroad companies affected by this law. This contention, however, is not borne out by the experience of the countries of Europe in which the law is now in operation. On the contrary, instead of working an injury it will result in a direct benefit to the railroad companies themselves by reducing the number of accidents of this character to the lowest possible minimum. It will have the effect of calling forth the exercise of the greatest possible degree of care in the operation of railroads and the maintenance of the highest standards of efficiency on the part of the employees. As a matter of self-protection, whenever the employer is held responsible for injuries resulting from the negligence of his employees he will see to it that every employee observes strictly the same rules of care and caution for the safety of his fellow-employees as he does for the safety of passengers and others who now have recourse to the courts for accidents occasioned by the failure of employees to exercise such care and caution. Not only will the passage of this bill materially safeguard the lives and limbs of employees, but it will also insure more considerate treatment for them by their employers and a better systemization of their work. It will be recalled by the Members of this House that an investigation of the apalling accident that occurred near the Royal Gorge in Colorado a few weeks ago, and which cost the lives of more than a score of people, disclosed that the accident was due to the failure of a telegraph operator to transmit certain orders relating to the running of the train. That investigation also developed the fact that the operator had been working continuously for thirty-six hours and had fallen asleep at his post. I undertake to say that if this proposed law had been on our statute books an accident of this kind would have been an absolute impossibility. The official in charge of the operating department of the railroad would have long since so thoroughly and completely systematized the work of his department that no employee would have been permitted under any circumstances to so overtax his powers of endurance.

According to the last report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the classification of railroad employees throughout the United States includes enginemen, 52,451; firemen, 55,004; conductors, 39,645, and other trainmen, 106,734. Statistics show that during the year ending June 30, 1905, trainmen to the number of 2,114 were killed and 29,275 were injured on the various railroads of this country. In other words, for every 120 employed 1 was killed, and for every 9 employed 1 was injured. These startling figures carry their own commentary with them. They stand as an unanswerable indictment against the continuation of a doctrine which is, in a large measure, responsible for this appalling list of fatalities.

Mr. Speaker, the railroad employees of the United States constitute a very material part of our best and most progressive citizenship. Taken as a whole, they are men of superior intelligence and character. The organizations which they have instituted among themselves for the betterment of their condition have always commanded the respect and admiration of the American people because of the exercise of intelligent conservatism and rigid adherence to the principles of law and order. They come to us to-day asking for the enactment of this legislation, which will contribute so much to their security of life and limb and give to their families that protection which every American citizen should enjoy under the law. In my judgment, this Congress would be derelict in its duty and dead to every impulse of humanity if it should fail to grant this request, which is founded upon justice, right, and reason.

Expenditures, Assessments, and Taxation in the District of Columbia.

OF

HON. EDWARD DE V. MORRELL,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 26, 1906.

The House having under consideration bills relating to the District of Columbia—

Mr. MORRELL said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: In the course of my remarks on the last District day I said that I would have some other matters to call to the attention of the House, and among them the matter of taxation and assessment. As a text, I shall quote the law governing assessments in the District of Columbia, which will be found in section 5 of the act making appropriations for the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and is as follows:

All real estate in the District of Columbia subject to taxation, including improvements thereon, shall be assessed at not less than two-thirds of the true value thereof.

The three things most striking in regard to taxation in the District of Columbia are, first, the undervaluation; second, the enormous outlay or expense of assessment, and, third, the system of exemptions.

1. The undervaluations.—In the course of my examination of the Sixteenth street condemnation proceedings I stumbled upon some truly astonishing instances illustrating this point. One man owned a piece which was assessed for taxation in 1902 at the value of $253. Now, when the Government took that same land for a street the jury gave him as damages $10,063. The jury acted under oath, and making, in all probability, a fair estimate of the actual value of the land taken gave the owner almost forty times as much as the land was rated at upon the assessor's books. I had wondered how on earth that jury could assess the total damages to property owners in that section at $796,000 while all the property along the line of the street was benefited only to the extent of $108,000. But when this was discovered I concluded that the land must have been so peculiarly adapted to streets and so useless for any other purpose that it couldn't be improved in value even by the construction of a grand boulevard through it.

Another striking case is that of Messrs. Elbert Robinson and Oliver A. Morris, who owned lot No. 125 in Denison & Leighton's subdivision of the Eslin estate. This lot contained 2,339.7 square feet and was assessed for taxes at a total valuation of $96. The jury awarded damages to the amount of $2,690.65, which was more than twenty-eight times the assessed valuation for taxes.

There were several other cases like that of Mr. Nicholson. I might say that they were nearly all like it, so far as the Sixteenth-street extension is concerned. The following table exhibits several of them, selected at random:

No effort was made in selecting these examples to find extreme cases. My object was merely to get instances of the relative ratio of taxation to the selling price of property in each of the subdivisions involved in the Sixteenth street condemnation proceedings. The damages awarded in these cases did not include damages for improvements, but solely for land taken.

The situation on Capitol Hill is not so bad, but it is still bad enough—very much worse than it ought to be.

There is a document published by Senator CULLOM's committee entitled the "Report of proceedings in acquiring square 686 as a site for the Senate office building," which throws a great deal of light on this subject. From this report I gather the following examples of the difference between the value of land in the District as assessed for taxes and the value of the same land when condemned for public uses:

1. A vacant lot on B street NE., containing 2,278 square feet, was assessed for taxes at $1.45 a square foot, and was assessed as a whole at $3,303. The owner asked the Government $9,714, and the jury awarded him $7,404.

2. Two vacant lots at the corner of Delaware avenue and B street NE. were assessed at a total value of $12,629. The jury awarded $42,042.

3. A front and back lot on B street NE. were assessed at a total valuation, exclusive of improvements, of $3,571. The improvements were assessed at $3,500, making the assessed value of the entire property $7,071. The jury awarded $19,775.

The law requires that assessments shall be made for at least two-thirds of the valuation, and in these cases, which are only fair examples of the whole, we find property paid for by the Government at from three to five times the rate at which it was listed for taxes. I am told that in the proceedings for acquiring square 690 as a site for an office building for the House of Representatives the amounts awarded as damages were in almost every case four or five times as great as valuations put upon the lands for taxes. And here I would like to digress a little. I am informed that when an effort was made to find the report and award of the jury in proceedings relating to square 690 the task proved too much. It was not among the records of the case in court roll 597, where it should have been. It had not been recorded either in the Interior Department or in the office of the register of deeds of the District of Columbia. The Secretary of the Interior had approved it and then it had been turned over to a lawyer, and, with the exception of that lawyer, there was apparently no living man in possession of the legal evidence necessary to verify the title of the United States to the lands included in square 690 of this city. And this seems to have been the case since May, 1904. Suppose all those lots were sold by the former owners to innocent purchasers without notice—there being no proper legal record of the transfer of title—who would be to blame? And what would be the result?

But, though it was impossible to find the report and award of the jury in any place where it ought to be filed or recorded, it was possible to find, in a petition for payment of the amount due Thomas F. Mallan under the award, the following facts, which may be taken, in the absence of the jury's complete report and award, as forming an average case. Mallan owned subdivision No. 10, in square 690. This parcel of land was assessed for taxation at $6,048, and the improvements thereon at $7,800, making a total valuation of $13,848. The jury awarded as damages $31,496.07, and the property was probably worth that sum. All this shows, not that the Government has paid too much for this land on Capitol Hill and in the section around the great central park which has been created beyond the city limits, but that it has apparently been grossly undervalued in the assessment of taxes. (Acts 1901–2, p. 616.)

In the business section of the city the discrepancies are not so great, the property there being taxed upon about half its real value. Stoneleigh Court, sublot 35, square 164, is assessed at $535,994, the lot being rated at $105,499 and the building at $430,000.

The New Willard Hotel, sublot 26, square 225, is assessed at $1,062,635—the ground at $442,635 and the building at $620,000.

The Colorado Building, sublot 60, square 252, is assessed at $536,592—the land at $136,592 and the building at $350,000.

Much complaint has been made in the city of Washington, not only against the discriminations in assessments, but also against the undervaluation of land with reference to the improvements thereon. Some of these complaints have found their way into the public prints. From the Washington Times of Sunday, January 7, 1906, I extract the following statements of Mr. E. W. Oyster, a prominent citizen of the District of Columbia. Among other things, Mr. Oyster said:

ALLEGED OUTRAGEOUS DISCRIMINATION.

But great as are the inequalities in the assessments of improvements, the inequalities in the assessments of land in different sections of the city and county, and even in the same locality, are very much greater, and the discrimination in favor of the land speculator as against the home owner and home seeker is simply outrageous.

LAND VALUES IN NEW YORK.

The last assessment in Greater New York shows that the value of land in that city is $3,697,686,935 and of improvements $1,100,657,854, the land values being 77 per cent of the whole.

LAND VALUES IN WASHINGTON.

The value of the land in the District of Columbia is probably 75 per cent, certainly not less than two-thirds, of the total value of land and improvements, and should therefore bear not less than two-thirds of the tax on real estate. The total assessment on this class of property is $239,461,985, the assessment on land being $136,843,419, on improvements $102,618,566. Had land and improvements been fairly assessed in proportion to value the assessment on the land would have been not less than $159,641,324 and on improvements not more than $79,820,661.

The discrimination against improvements and in favor of land could not be justified at any time, and surely can not be justified now, as the law under which the present assessment was made provides "that hereafter all real estate in the District of Columbia subject to taxation, including improvements thereon, shall be assessed at not less than two-thirds of the true value thereof and shall be taxed 1½ per cent upon the assessed valuation."

The law is both positive and clear and was intended to prevent in the future the unjust discrimination in favor of land-grabbing syndicates, speculators, and monopolists. Had the assessors obeyed the law in making the assessment of real estate for the next three years, improvements would have been assessed at about $125,000,000 and land at about $375,000,000. This would have produced, at $1.50 on the $100, $7,500,000, or about double the amount desired to be raised from that class of property. It is not necessary at this time to enter into a discussion as to whether or not the law is just what it should be, but if the assessors, with the provisions above quoted "staring them in the face," assumed the responsibility of ignoring or evading it to the extent of raising only such an amount of revenue as they think necessary, then they should have ignored or evaded it to the same extent in favor of improvements as they have in favor of land.

SHOULD HAVE A SQUARE DEAL.

An assessment of one-third the true value of land and improvements—say, $187,500,000 on land and $62,500,000 on improvements—would have raised a larger revenue than will be raised under the inequitable assessment made for the next three years. Such an assessment would probably raise a howl from those who are holding vacant land out of use for speculative purposes, but should, and no doubt would, meet with the approval of all owners of improved property who believe in the principles of justice and "a square deal."

The assertion that land values are not less than two-thirds the value of both land and improvements is based on actual sales in different sections of the District in comparison with assessed values.

GOVERNMENT PURCHASES.

For instance, the Government paid five and a half times more than the assessment for the land on which the new Government Printing Office stands, and three and a half times more than the assessment for the land on which the House and Senate buildings are being erected.

The assertion is frequently made that the price paid for land by the Government is not a fair test of true value, for the reason that the United States is alleged to be more generous in the purchase of such property than private parties. However that may be in other cities, the facts do not sustain that contention in regard to the District of Columbia.

PURCHASES BY PRIVATE PARTIES.

The sale to private parties of 2,000 square feet of ground at the southwest corner of square 236, at Fourteenth and U streets, was noted in the city papers of August 26, 1905, and the price paid for the corner was given as $19,000. The assessment on this land is $3,300, and on the improvement, since torn down, was $3,000. Assuming $6,000 to have been the true value of the building, the amount paid for the land was $13,000, or about four times the assessment.

By deeds placed on record in December, 1905, the Anheuser-Busch Brewing Association secured from the Bakers' Cooperative Association 11,000 square feet of ground at the southwest corner of North Capitol and F streets. The city papers of December 28 gave the price paid as $55,000, or $5 a foot. The assessment on 2,750 feet of this ground is 90 cents a foot and on the remainder—8,250 feet—65 cents a foot, averaging 71½ cents a foot, making the total assessment on the land $7,837.50. The improvements are assessed at $4,600. After deducting double the assessment on the improvements (of little value to the purchasers) from the total amount paid, it will be seen that the price paid for the land was about $4.13 a foot—nearly six times the assessment.

LAND VALUES.

A comparison of the assessments with the selling prices of land will convince any fair-minded person that the above examples are not exceptions to the general rule—that is, that the selling price of land in the city, which must be somewhere near the true value, is not less than from two and a half to four times the assessment on it, and that large and expensive improvements are assessed at from 10 to 30 per cent lower than small ones in proportion to value.

The land in the square immediately north of the Treasury Department is assessed at from $4 to $30 a square foot, the northwest corner of Fifteenth street and Pennsylvania avenue being the $30 corner, and, in the judgment of the assessors, the most valuable parcel of land in the District. It no doubt cost its present owners nearly three times the assessment.

Square No. 222, between Fourteenth and Fifteenth streets and New York avenue and H. streets, is assessed at from $4 to $25 a foot, the northeast corner of Fifteenth street and New York avenue being the most valuable part of the square.

The Equitable Building ground at Fifteenth and G streets, is assessed at $22 a foot, the Commercial Bank corner, Fourteenth and G, at $20 a foot, and the Bond Building corner, at $15 a foot. Taken as a whole, this square is said to be the most valuable piece of land in the city.

ASSESSMENTS ON IMPROVEMENTS.

The assessments on improvements range from 40 to 65 per cent of true value, averaging about 50 per cent. The New Willard Hotel is assessed at $620,000. The Colorado Building is assessed at $350,000. The Star office and the Loan and Trust Building are each assessed at $200,000, and are among the few large structures assessed up to the average of 50 per cent of true value. It is safe to say that neither the Willard Hotel nor the Colorado Building is assessed up to the average for improvements.

The most valuable private residences in the city stand on adjoining squares on the south side of Massachusetts avenue northwest. One is assessed at $250,000 and the other at $225,000, probably not more than one-third of their cost.

Outside of the city limits the discrimination in favor of the owner of vacant land as against the home owner is even more striking than in the city. Improvements are assessed at from 50 to 60 per cent of their cost, while land is assessed at from 10 to 30 per cent of its true value, an average of not more than 25 per cent.

For example, land in block 27, Petworth, purchased three years ago for 30 cents a foot, now worth about 40 or 45 cents a foot, is assessed at 12 cents.

The land in blocks 37 and 38 is assessed at 2, 3, 4, and 5 cents a foot. None of this land can be bought for less than from six to twelve times the assessment.

Land in block 39 was purchased for 18 cents a foot about three years ago, and for 25 cents a foot about eighteen months ago, and frame houses costing probably $2,200 and $4,000 erected thereon. This whole block is assessed at 2 cents a foot, not more than 10 per cent of true value. The improvements are assessed at about 50 per cent of cost.

Very recently land in blocks 73 and 78, on which about forty brick houses are being erected, sold for 40 cents a foot. Three-fourths of the land in these blocks is assessed at 5 cents a foot, the balance at 6 and 8 cents.

The assessment on the land in Petworth is from 10 to 30 per cent of true value, averaging about 20 per cent. The improvements are assessed at fully 50 per cent.

Let no one imagine that the owners of vacant land in Petworth have been specially favored. An examination of the assessor's books will show that the same discrimination has been made in favor of the land speculator in every other section of the District. Millions of square feet which can not be bought for less than from 10 to 50 cents a foot are assessed at from 1 to 10 cents a foot, and thousands of acres which can not be purchased for less than from $2,000 to $8,000 an acre are assessed at from $400 to $2,000 an acre.

The flat buildings of the District seem to be taxed according to location rather than actual value; those in the business section, like the Stoneleigh, being taxed on a 50 per cent basis, and those in the suburbs and outlying sections on a 10 and 20 per cent basis. This is apparent from the assessor's report for 1905 (page 81 of the report of the Commissioners), where we find that those buildings located in different sections of the city of Washington are assessed as follows:

Northwest, 109 flat buildings, assessed at $495,200 for all.
Southwest, 1 building, at $3,000.
Northeast, 145 buildings, $351,500 for all.
Southeast, 29 buildings, at $65,300 for all.
Total, 285 buildings, at $915,000 for all.

Thus it will be seen that the average value of a flat building, according to the assessor, is only $3,210 in Washington.

If we deduct the assessed value of Stoneleigh Court from the total value of all such buildings ($915,000), we have $485,000 as the total value of 284 flat buildings in the city, making the average value of such a building only $1,705. Many of these flat buildings are immense buildings, costing hundreds of thousands of dollars. This class of property is evidently undervalued almost as greatly as lands around Rock Creek Park.

From the report of the Select Committee to Investigate Tax Assessments in the District of Columbia in the Fifty-second Congress, first session (H. Rept. No. 1469), I extract the following:

Now, the attempt to collect taxes which it is thus obvious can not be collected, and as to which there is evidently a feeling that regards their collection as unjust, must by its reactive effects render more difficult than it ought to be the full and equitable assessment of taxes on landed property. And so it is with the assessment of taxes upon buildings and improvements. The value of the small and cheaply built house may be fairly estimated by a look from the outside, but the value of one of those costly edifices that are becoming so common in the Federal District can not be told without close examination. A door, a pier glass, a marble floor, a stained window, a carved staircase in one of these houses has a value far greater than the entire homestead or hired residences of one who among the great masses of our people would be deemed well-to-do. * * * The poor man with a small and poor house has to submit. A few dollars difference in the assessment will not pay him for the time and trouble of protesting. But the rich man, with the costly house, not merely has more time and larger interests, but finds the difference in the assessment a more important matter. Thus in both these ways there are powerful tendencies constantly at work to produce unjust inequality in the taxation of buildings and improvements.

This idea is further manifest in the difference made between speculative and business interests in the city of Washington.

The latter are apparently discriminated against. In addition to the cases cited from the report of the jury in the Sixteenth-street extension proceedings, I might cite numerous others which have come to light through the newspapers. For instance, take the following items:

One square north of Holmead Manor, from Fourteenth street extended to Brightwood avenue. Assessed at $700 per acre; equal to 1⅓ cents to 2½ cents per foot. Sold from 30 cents to 35 cents per foot.

Five acres in Jones tract, on Sixteenth street extended, just beyond Brightwood, sold at $3,500 per acre. Assessed at $300.

Nine acres opposite Cleveland cottage sold at $6,000 per acre. Assessed at $150 per acre.

March 29, 1903, 4 acres joining the Catholic University grounds sold for $4,500 per acre. Assessed at $700 per acre.

November, 1894, Dumblane farm, 100 acres, sold for $150,000. Assessed at $150 per acre.

Twenty-nine and one-half acres on Rock Creek Ford road, plat 6, assessed at $150 per acre. Total value, $4,430.

Rosedale, Tennallytown road, assessed in 1893 for $300 an acre. Sold for more than $3,000 per acre.

February, 1894, 14 acres sold for $185,000, or $13,214 an acre. Assessed at $6,730 per acre.

Fifty acres between Brookland and Metropolitan View sold to a syndicate of Washington, New York, and Richmond men for $107,000. Assessed at $35,832.

From all these citations it is evident that the land of the District of Columbia is not taxed as under the law it should be, and shows that were the National Government to assume the entire cost of the District of Columbia, as some people would have it do, that no one would be benefited except the landowners. From the report of the committee before cited, page 9, I find these words:

They (the landowners) would still demand from tenants the full rental value of land regardless of the remission in the assessment on it, and the effect of this net increase in the profits of landowning would be to raise the selling value of land and to greatly stimulate land speculation. Thus the effect of such liberality toward the Federal District on the part of Congress would ultimately be only to increase enormously a few large fortunes and to drive a greater number of citizens into narrower quarters and make it more difficult for them to live.

It is inconceivable how the method of assessment which now obtains in the District of Columbia can be reconciled with the law governing the assessment of taxes, which I cited at the beginning of my remarks, namely, that—

All real estate in the District of Columbia subject to taxation, including improvements thereon, shall be assessed at not less than two-thirds of the true value thereof.

This law appears to be habitually violated in the District assessor's office. The facts above stated prove that it is entirely disregarded.

In the article of Mr. Oyster we find him making virtually the same charges and stating the answer of the assessor. Mr. Oyster said:

That tax dodging, a species of graft, is one of the greatest evils of this day and generation is conceded by every honest man, and that Washington has its full quota of tax dodgers and grafters is self-evident. In my judgment the assessors are more responsible for this shameful condition of affairs than the owners of property, at least so far as real estate is concerned.

"It is not only wrong, but it is unsafe," said ex-President Harrison in a speech before the Union League Club, of Chicago, in 1898, "to make a show in our homes and on the street that is not made in the tax returns. This country can not continue to exist half taxed and half free. Each person has a personal interest—a pecuniary interest—in the tax returns of his neighbor. We are members of a great partnership, and it is the right of each to know what every other member is contributing to the partnership and what he is taking from it. It is not a private affair; it is a public concern of the first importance."

Thus encouraged by the words of the honest man and great statesman above quoted, I make bold to challenge the fairness of the past and present assessments of real estate and personal property in this District.

TESTIMONY OF EXPERTS.

In 1892, under oath before a select committee of the House of Representatives, appointed "to inquire into all alleged irregularities pertaining to assessments in the District of Columbia," Samuel Phillips, ex-president of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, a large owner of real estate, and an expert on the value of such property, said: "I have been familiar with every assessment made in Washington during the past thirty years, and there has never been one which has not been viciously defective, bearing severely on some, who were generally the poorer class, with inexpensive improvements, and favoring the richer, with large and important buildings. * * * The rich man will probably get off with the payment of one-half the taxes that are placed upon the poorer men."

A number of other experts on real estate values gave similar evidence before that committee, which is printed in House Report No. 1469, Fifty-second Congress, first session.

PETWORTH PROTESTS.

With these statements in mind, and after investigation, having reason to believe that all subsequent assessments had been "viciously defective," I introduced, and the Petworth Citizens' Association, in April, 1905, unanimously adopted, a series of resolutions setting forth the above facts, and requested the assessors to correct the injustice complained of by assessing all property equitably, on the basis of value, "without fear or favor," as required by law.

THE ASSESSOR'S STATEMENT.

In reply to these resolutions Hopewell H. Darneille issued a statement addressed to the Commissioners in defense of the board of assessors, in which he asserted that certain statements in the resolutions of the Petworth Association were unjust and conveyed "an imputation which the board of assessors justly resents." In the statement referred to he also said: "the assessing of either real or personal property is, in the abstract, purely a matter of opinion based upon experience and comparison. * * * I do not undertake to defend the action of the authorities intrusted with the assessment of real estate for the past thirty years, but with a full knowledge of the records of this office, I can state that I know of no radical departures from what values should have been. * * * In regard to the discrimination in favor of large holdings, it may or may not be that property for years has been assessed unjustly, in that small homes have paid from 25 to 50 per cent higher rate, but certain it is that such is not the case now. Both large and small properties are assessed on the same basis."

The majority of taxpayers—and every man and woman pays taxes directly or indirectly—will, doubtless, agree with Mr. Darneille that the assessing of property in the abstract has been "purely a matter of opinion," and, in a very large number of cases, very poor opinion, indeed.

If, "with a full knowledge of the records of his office," the assessor knows of "no radical departures from what values should have been," then I respectfully suggest that he "store his mind with useful knowledge" by reading House report No. 1469, above referred to.

DISAGREES WITH THE ASSESSOR.

Notwithstanding Mr. Darneille's assertion that "both large and small properties are assessed on the same basis," under the new assessment an examination of the assessments on a large number of improvements in different sections of the city has demonstrated to my satisfaction that the assessments on that class of property vary from about 40 to 60 per cent of true value, and in exceptional cases still higher on small improvements, averaging about 50 per cent for the District, the advantage, as usual, being in favor of the larger and more valuable building.

Nor does the complaint stop with the method of the assessment of lands and their improvements. Mr. Oyster urges the following complaint against the method of assessing personal property:

There also appears to be a very large screw loose somewhere in the personal tax appraisement machinery. This class of property in Washington is alleged to be assessed at 100 per cent of true value, and on that basis amounted to $26,575,819.66 last year.

Compare our $26,500,000 assessment on personal property on a 100 per cent basis with such cities as Cleveland and Cincinnati on a 60 per cent basis, with San Francisco on a 65 per cent basis, and with Detroit on a 100 per cent basis, and consider what the great difference between the assessments in those cities and Washington means. Does it mean what has been frequently charged by Senators and Representatives in debate on the floors of Congress, that this District is "the paradise for tax dodgers?"

The following are the assessments on personal property in the cities named (see Census Bulletin No. 20, p. 440) for the year 1903:

City.	Population.	Rate.	Amount.
		Per ct.
New York	3,716,139	100	$980,866,092
Chicago	1,873,880	20	100,991,052
Philadelphia	1,367,716	100	427,501,825
Boston	594,618	100	236,155,523
Cleveland	414,950	60	51,851,910
San Francisco	355,919	65	127,554,179
Cincinnati	332,934	60	44,785,700
Detroit	309,619	100	81,671,860
Providence	186,742	100	43,241,080

Cleveland, only one-fourth larger in population than Washington, in 1903, on a basis of only 60 per cent of true value, assessed double the amount of personal property assessed in Washington in 1905, on a basis of 100 per cent of true value. On the Washington basis the assessment in Cleveland would have been about $88,000,000, about three and one-third times our assessment. San Francisco, not much larger than Washington in population, in 1903, on a basis of 65 per cent of true value, assessed over four times as much as our assessment in 1905. On the Washington basis of 100 per cent the assessment in San Francisco would have been about $172,000,000, six and one-half times the assessment here in 1905.

What is the trouble with the Washington personal tax machinery? Is it with the machine or with the engineers? If the trouble is with the machine, then Congress should reconstruct it. If not, then the assessors should rigidly enforce the law, and all those within its reach should honestly obey it and "render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's."

And there is no proper machinery for correcting these abuses; for whenever a taxpayer appeals from an assessment on his property, the appeal lies from the man who made it in one capacity to the same man in another capacity. The board of equalization should be an entirely different board from the board of assessors.

2. The enormous outlay or expense.—The regular force in the assessor's office consists of thirty men; one at $4,000; two at $2,000 each; three at $1,400 each; seven at $1,200 each; three at $3,000 each; one at $1,500; eight at $1,000 each; two at $900 each, and two at $600 each. In addition to this the appropriation bill for 1905–6 carried $2,500 for temporary relief. The salary roll was $43,000. The total expenditure for the assessor's office is placed in the report of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for 1905, at $64,397.

The salary account in the assessor's office for the city of Buffalo for the same period, was $21,753; other expenses, $1,914; total, $23,669.

The Washington office is complicated to the extreme, and the expense account entirely too large.

The department of assessors cost Pittsburg, for the year ending January 31, 1905, $37,000, or $27,397 less than Washington.

The assessment of the revenue for the city of St. Louis for the year ending April 10, 1905, was $70,360, or but $5,963 more than Washington, although double in population and nearly double in wealth.

3. The system of exemptions.—The fact that the United States pays one-half of the expenses of the District of Columbia seems to have led the local population to the idea that property and privileges in the District should be taxed at one-half the rate paid by the people of other cities. By the act of June 11, 1878, directing the Commissioners of the District to make estimates of the probable expenses for the ensuing year, the following provision is made:

> To the extent to which Congress shall approve of said estimates, Congress shall appropriate the amount of 50 per cent thereof and the remaining 50 per cent shall be levied and assessed upon the taxable property and privileges in said District other than the property of the United States and of the District of Columbia.

This provision is ambiguous. It does not define taxable property; and the Commissioners have exercised a very broad discretion in the matter of declaring particular pieces of property nontaxable or exempt.

In 1904 the total assessed value of land exempt in the District of Columbia was $177,306,418, and the total assessed value of improvements exempt was $106,600,430, making a grand total of $283,906,848, which was at that time 57 per cent of the entire assessed value of property in the District.

The property exempt comprised not only property belonging to the United States and the District of Columbia, but also property devoted to religious, charitable, and educational uses. The total valuation of exempted property under the last three heads was $12,616,686.

Considering the rapid increase of holdings by religious, charitable, and educational institutions in the District, I heartily concur in a suggestion contained in the report of the assessor for the year 1902, which is:

> Immunity from participation in the expense of the municipality is a privilege which should be sparingly granted. That a statute should be enacted clearly defining what property is exempt from taxation, confining the same to institutions conducted wholly for public benefit, and leaving as little discretion as possible with the officials of the Government, thus avoiding opportunities for and claims of discrimination.

I trust that the Members of the House will give these matters which I have presented the consideration which they deserve.

Distribution of President's Message.

OF

HON. JAMES R. MANN,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, December 15, 1905.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and having under consideration the resolution (H. Res. 42) for the distribution of the President's message—

Mr. MANN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: We have under consideration the usual resolution of the House for the distribution of the President's message to the various committees of the House, which have jurisdiction of the different subjects referred to in the message. To that resolution the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], in the opening of this debate, gave notice that he proposed to offer an amendment referring so much of the President's message as relates to the regulation of insurance companies to the Committee on Ways and Means. The only method by which the Committee on Ways and Means could exercise jurisdiction over the subject of insurance would be through the taxing power. Immediately, when he made his proposition to that effect, I asked him some questions, drawing the attention of the House to his proposition.

There are three committees of this House which may claim jurisdiction of bills relating to insurance, depending upon the theory of the different bills. The Committee on Ways and Means might properly have jurisdiction of a bill which proposed to exercise the taxing power. If the theory of the bill is that insurance shall be regulated on the ground that it be interstate commerce, then the bill should properly be considered by our Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. On the other hand, it seems to me that it might be wise to have the Judiciary Committee consider the subject in the first instance and determine whether in the opinion of that committee Congress can constitutionally exercise any jurisdiction over the general subject of insurance in the several States, and if so, under what provision of the Constitution and upon what theory.

I do not contend that all the bills that may be introduced upon the subject shall necessarily be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, but I object to any reference of the President's message which shall assume that the only way in which regulation can be had is through the taxing power of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, no more grave question has ever been presented to the Congress of the United States than the question as to how far we can and ought to go in the control by the nation of the corporate interests of the country. And when we come to the solution of that great question I hope that every Committee of this House that is willing to give attention to it may have before such committee a bill upon the subject, and that every member of every committee may have received information by his committee work in giving active personal attention to the consideration of the subject.

I dispute the proposition that we can only act in insurance matters through an exercise of the taxing power. Mr. Chairman, in my service of eight years in this House, as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I have been compelled to give some attention to the subject of insurance. In the bill creating the Department of Commerce and Labor, which I had the honor to report from that committee into the House, there was a section creating a Bureau of Insurance. In section 6 of that bill as reported into the House our committee proposed that—

> There shall be in the Department of Commerce and Labor a bureau to be called the "Bureau of Insurance." * * * It shall be the province and duty of said Bureau, under the direction of the Secretary, to exercise such control as may be provided by law over every insurance company, society, or association transacting business in the United States outside of the State, Territory, or district wherein the same is organized, and to foster, promote, and develop the various insurance industries of the United States by gathering, compiling, publishing, and supplying all available and useful information concerning such insurance companies and the business of insurance, and by such other methods and means as may be prescribed by the Secretary or provided by law.

When that bill came before the House for consideration, the solid Democratic side of the House, aided by some very distinguished gentlemen on the Republican side of the House, who had been excited, possibly, by the various State insurance commissioners, succeeded in voting out of the bill by a narrow majority the section creating the Bureau of Insurance. If that Bureau of Insurance had remained in the bill it is certain that much valuable information would have been gathered and published concerning insurance companies and their methods of doing business and that a careful study of the subject of insurance and of national regulation of that subject would have been made and presented to Congress by this time.

Mr. Chairman, some time ago, and before the recent scandal concerning insurance companies in New York became public property, I addressed myself to a study of the insurance question, and I have prepared two rough drafts of bills upon the subject. One of these bills proceeds along the lines of giving the National Government practically exclusive control of insurance on the ground that it is interstate commerce. I do not know that I shall ever introduce that bill, because I have grave doubt both of its constitutionality and of its propriety. I realize as well as other gentlemen in the House that we have before us constantly the question as to whether we shall endeavor to wipe out the State lines and reduce the States practically to the same position which the counties now occupy in the country—mere geographical divisions, with little or no authority of government.

The other bill, which I expect possibly to introduce, will not, I think, to any extent trench upon the constitutional question.

After the House had stricken out of the bill creating the Department of Commerce and Labor the section creating a bureau of insurance, there was inserted in conference a provision giving the Bureau of Corporations power to gather and publish information concerning insurance companies, a power, I believe, never yet exercised to any extent. But I would go further. I would provide that an insurance company, voluntarily on its part and without requirement of law, be permitted to register itself in the Bureau of Corporations, after investigation by that Bureau as to its financial condition and as to its following the provisions of law in its business. Then it should receive a certificate as to its condition, giving also to the Bureau the power constantly of examination for the purpose of obtaining public information concerning the insurance companies and forbidding the company, if the Bureau shall find it in unsound financial condition or violating the law at any time, from afterwards using the fact that it had ever been registered in the Bureau, or had received any certificate as to its condition, on the penalty only that it could not make use of the mails.

Here is an opportunity for Congress to act, if it wishes to do so, without trenching upon the rights of the States, or interfering with the control of the States over insurance within their own borders, and not affecting the question of taxation in the States, but simply affecting the question of public information. The difficulty we meet now in the country is that, while it is possible for the State of New York to control the insurance companies in her State, it is not possible for the State of Illinois to control the insurance companies in New York. Illinois may exclude them from her midst, but she can not control them, and it is not practicable for every one of the States to have great insurance companies. We shall continue probably to have the bulk of the insurance business done by the great companies.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the gentleman think that the power to exclude an insurance company as a foreign corporation, not protected by the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, carries with it the power to admit it, provided it does business in accordance with certain regulations prescribed by the State to which it is admitted?

Mr. MANN. I presume that follows, Mr. Chairman. At least that has always been the contention which I have made; but that does not affect the right of the State of Illinois to do anything with the New York company. All it can do is to keep it out or let it in under certain terms, and if the people of Illinois wish to take out insurance in a New York company they may do so, but they can obtain no information through their own sources except by exercising the power of exclusion.

I would furnish to all the States information derived by the Government only when the insurance companies voluntarily give it. That information which would have the stamp of careful examination, so that the people of all the States might have the information voluntarily given by the company, and I take it that it would be a great aid to each of the States and the insurance departments of each of the States. As the matter now stands, if an insurance department of one State wishes to know anything about the insurance company of another State it must send its own examiners to that State. I would not take away that power; I would not force them to duplicate the examinations; but I would make it so the insurance company shall have the opportunity to be examined and the examination be made public, whether it be for the insurance company or against the insurance company.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does the gentleman think that the exclusion from a State by the department would be sufficient to keep all companies in line of duty?

Mr. MANN. Why, Mr. Chairman, I do not think; I know it has not done so. Gentlemen talk about what the powers of a State ought to be and what the powers of the National Government ought to be. The trouble is that it has not taken care of the insurance question. We all know that some of the insurance companies are not run as they ought to be; that the people do not have the information to which they are entitled. Referring again to the able remark of a former distinguished Democrat, it is a condition and not a theory merely which confronts us. We can theorize about the power of the National Government, the powers of a State, and meanwhile the people are being deprived of their rights under insurance.

Insurance has become no longer a luxury. It is a necessity to the people of the land. They are entitled to as much protection as the Government can afford them. I would not deprive the States of the rights which they have, but I would supplement their rights by furnishing to the people of all the States as much information as the insurance companies were willing to give, and I think public sentiment and business would soon force them to furnish by this method all the information which they could concerning the character of their business and their financial condition.

Mr. WATSON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Isn't it a fact that they have been making voluntary statements for many years? Have not the Equitable, the New York Life, and all the other companies been making voluntary statements as to their condition? Isn't that true?

Mr. MANN. They have not been doing it under an examination by the National Government. It is a fact that they have been making statements to the various State insurance superintendents and commissioners. It is a fact that they have been frequently examined, and it is also a fact that these statements have been sometimes false or misleading, and that these examinations have been utterly insufficient to ascertain the truth.

Mr. WATSON. That being true, what difference would these voluntary statements make? What difference would there be in the voluntary statements proposed by the gentleman and those heretofore made?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I presume I did not make myself as clear as I should. I would permit the insurance company to make a voluntary application for a register, and when the application is made give the Commissioner of Corporations the opportunity and make it his duty to make a most thorough and careful examination, both as to the financial condition of the company and as to the legality of its business, and to publish the facts which he finds and give a certificate as to the condition of the company.

Mr. WATSON. But the statement of the company is to be voluntary?

Mr. MANN. I would not require the company to submit to an examination except on its own application; and when it makes application, give to the Commissioner of Corporations the power to make a most complete examination. I see no difficulty at all in that.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman will pardon me. His idea is that, having submitted to the jurisdiction, they could have no complaint to make as to the extent to which it goes?

Mr. MANN. If they submit to the jurisdiction, if they get a register, they must submit to the examination, and the people, in the conduct of their business, would force them to do it. A certificate that they had passed this examination and had obtained a register would be issued. I would not put any compulsion on them, so far as power is concerned, except the compulsion of a want of business.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. PRINCE. Does the gentleman have in mind an examination somewhat similar to that which national banks are now subjected to?

Mr. MANN. Well, if I had my way I would give them a much more complete examination than the national banks are now subjected to. I think that is not as complete as it should be.

Mr. PRINCE. I was going to suggest that there are a number of national banks in these prosperous times in the hands of receivers, and yet in each case the bank examiners have certified that it was a proper place for the people to put their money on deposit, and it has turned out that it was not a proper place for them to deposit their money.

Mr. MANN. People will conitnue to fail, companies will continue to fail, corporations will continue to go out of business no matter what examinations may be provided; but, under the proposition which I make, the General Government, through the Commissioner of Corporations, will be able to make as complete an examination and exercise as complete control over any insurance company which submits itself to examination as though the Government had full and complete authority upon the subject.

My proposition is that any insurance company wishing to avail itself of the provisions of the act may make application to be registered and may, after the proper examination by the Bureau of Corporations, receive a certificate stating that such company is registered; that any company which is registered shall furnish an annual statement, under oath, showing its condition; that the Bureau of Corporations may at any time require additional information to be furnished and may make such inquiries and such inspection and examination as is desired; that it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Corporations to make examinations often enough to keep fully posted not only as to the method of doing business by the insurance company, but also as to its financial condition. The only penalty which I propose for a company which declines to permit the Commissioner to make an examination at any time is to revoke the certificate of registry. This may not be a perfect method of bringing insurance companies under the control of some national authority, but I think that no company would be able to transact business long without having received the certificate of the Commissioner of Corporations.

What the people want to know is the condition of the insurance company and whether the character of the business which it writes is a legitimate business or a pure gambling speculation. It is impossible for each of the forty-five States and the different Territories to exercise sufficient control over the various insurance companies of the land to insure safety to their respective citizens.

I do not in this bill propose to trench upon the rights of the States at all. I propose to give an additional safeguard to the people, the safeguard of thorough examination, of complete inspection, of uniform publication.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I protest against a bill drawn along these lines, which has no reference to the taxing power, being sent to the Committee on Ways and Means, whose only jurisdiction over the subject-matter is by the imposition of a tax. I believe that the Committee on the Judiciary or the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce ought to be given the power to pursue the investigation of such a bill. I would favor a resolution such as was passed at the other end of this Capitol, providing that the Committee on the Judiciary shall make investigation of the question, but I would not foreclose the right of the members of other committees to pursue their investigation.

Nobody in this House believes that there will be legislation enacted at this session of Congress upon the subject. It is too grave a question to decide in a moment. It will require the best thought of the ablest people possibly for years, and when action comes it may come only a step at a time; but to now say that we refuse to consider the question is not fair to ourselves, is not fair to the insurance companies, and, what is more important, is not fair to the people who either have insurance or who may wish to take insurance. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois reserve the balance of his time?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Denaturized alcohol Free of tax in the arts and industries ann for fuel, light, and power—The farmers' coal mine—The manufacturers' raw material.

OF

HON. E. J. HILL,

OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, April 16, 1906.

The House having under consideration H. R. 17453, entitled "An act for the withdrawal from bond, tax free, of domestic alcohol when rendered unfit for beverage or liquid medicinal uses by mixture with suitable denaturing materials"—

Mr. HILL of Connecticut said:

Mr. SPEAKER: On the 25th day of May, 1896, nearly ten years ago, I addressed the House of Representatives on the subject of free alcohol in the arts and industries. I showed then that it was not a new proposition, for on the 22d of June, 1888, William McKinley, chairman of the committee on resolutions of the national Republican convention of that year, had embodied it in the party platform, and that it was not even a new legislative proposition, for it had been made a part of the Mills bill in 1888, and the report of the Senate Committee on Finance had referred to it as follows:

Senate Report No. 2332, Fiftieth Congress, first session.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Finance, submitted the following report (to accompany bill H. R. 9051).

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, respectfully report:

* * * * * * *

The provisions of the substitute which allow the use of alcohol in the industrial arts free from taxation would prove of great benefit to a large number of important manufactures. Alcohol is used in the production of more than 500 mechanical and pharmaceutical preparations and in many of the mechanical and industrial arts, and its use in all these directions would be largely extended if the onerous tax should be abolished. The heavy tax upon alcohol unnecessarily increases the price of many manufactured products, with no corresponding benefit except the resulting revenue, which is now unnecessary.

Free industrial alcohol was actually authorized in the law of August, 1894, known as the "Wilson bill," but Mr. Carlisle declined to carry it into effect, on the ground that further legislation than that contained in section 61 was necessary "for an effective and beneficial execution of the law." The real reason, as was well understood at the time, was the condition of the Treasury, and a fear of further loss of revenue.

The provisions of both the Mills bill and the Wilson bill included the use of free denatured alcohol in patent medicines and liquid alcoholic medicinal preparations of all kinds, and according to the best estimate at that time, would have deprived the Treasury of about $2,000,000 annually. The bill now before the House specifically forbids the use of tax-free denatured alcohol in such preparations, and this, supplemented by the fact that wood alcohol and other inferior, but more expensive substitutes have during the past ten years almost wholly displaced tax-paid grain alcohol in manufacturing operations, eliminates the question of revenue from serious consideration, but in lieu of that we find the strange claim advanced that a so-called "vested interest" in a vicious system is good ground for its continuance.

POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES IN TAXATION OF SPIRITS.

The first taxation of spirits was in 1791, and varied in amount from 9 to 25 cents per gallon, according to the degree of strength. This taxation continued till 1800, when it was repealed upon the recommendation of Thomas Jefferson.

It was renewed as a war measure in 1813 and repealed in 1818.

For forty-four years spirits were free of all tax.

In July, 1862, the tax was again imposed as a war measure and fixed at 20 cents per proof gallon.

On March 17, 1864, it was raised to 60 cents per gallon.

On July 1, 1864, it was raised to $1.50 per gallon.

On January 1, 1865, it was raised again to $2 per gallon.

In 1868 it was reduced to 50 cents and increased in 1872 to 70 cents. Increased again in 1875 to 90 cents, and on August the 28th, 1894, increased to $1.10 per proof gallon, where it now stands.

EFFECT OF TAXATION.

In 1860, with alcohol free of tax, the consumption of distilled spirits was about 90,000,000 gallons, or about 3 gallons per capita. David A. Wells estimated that 33⅓ per cent of this was for industrial purposes. He says:

The consumption of distilled spirits in the United States previous to the war for a great variety of purposes had become enormous, affording a practical illustration of the curious varying relations between prices and consumption, and also of what may be considered in the light of an axiom in political economy, namely, that practically there is no limit to the consumption of any useful commodity, provided that through a reduction of cost or price it is brought within the purchasing power of those who desire to consume.

And the reverse of this process is equally effective. The first result of the tax was a reduction in consumption and a falling off in production in 1863 to 16,000,000 gallons, and as the tax was increased a still more marked effect was shown in other directions. Wells says:

The immediate effect of this imposition and rapid increase of internal taxes on distilled spirits was a series of industrial and commercial phenomena, more remarkable than anything of the kind before recorded in economic history. In short, the influence of these taxes was to entirely and rapidly revolutionize great branches of domestic industry, and in some instances to utterly destroy them.

Under a $1.50 and a $2 tax for four years prior to 1868, the consumption was twenty-five hundredths of a gallon per capita for all purposes. Under a 50-cent tax for four years from 1868 to 1872, the consumption was 1½ gallons per capita, so that with the tax lowered 75 per cent the consumption increased 600 per cent.

In 1874, under a 70-cent tax, it was 1.4 gallons per capita.

In 1876, under a 90-cent tax, it was 1.23 gallons per capita.

In 1880, under a 90-cent tax, it was 1.21 gallons per capita.

In 1900, under a 90-cent tax, it was about 1.15 gallons per capita.

In 1905, under a $1.10 tax, it was 1.36 gallons per capita.

We have reached a result, from the folly of our legislation in the past, that the one product of our farms which we can produce cheaper than any other nation in the world has been driven out of industrial uses by excessive taxation, and the comparatively small quantity which we do make is confined almost wholly to beverage and liquid medicinal purposes.

It has made us unable to compete with our commercial rivals in the markets of the world in some industries in which we have superior natural advantages, and in others compelled us to be dependent upon them for our home requirements instead of supplying their wants, as we should be now doing but for this enormous tax.

The height of all absurdity was reached in the last eighteen months in importing from the Far East nearly 7,000,000 gallons of gasoline to meet the ever-increasing demand for power purposes, when we might have grown the corn which would have made a better, cheaper, and safer fuel upon the very farms from which the demand for power came.

We might produce artificial silk for the whole world, for the cotton and corn from which it is made grow here side by side, and we have a world monopoly of both. But it takes a gallon and a half of alcohol for every pound of the finished product, and $3.12 tax excludes the industry and yields no revenue whatever. Meanwhile we are paying France $2.50 per pound for an article which we could easily make for $1.25, and furnishing them the raw material with which to make it, free of tax.

We are shipping in bond thousands of gallons of alcohol yearly across the Canadian border free of tax for the manufacture of fulminating powder in Canadian factories and by Canadian workmen and bringing back the finished product at 30 per cent duty, for domestic consumption, instead of selling to them the finished product, as we surely will do under this legislation.

Under a drawback system we allow our factories to use foreign spirits free of duty for export products, while taxing the like product of the American farm $2.08 per gallon when put to an identically similar use.

We are dependent upon Germany for a sufficient supply of fusel oil, a product of the distillation of spirits. In twelve years our imports have increased from half a million to three and one-half million pounds and the price from 2.4 cents to 13.2 cents per pound. One hundred and fifty bushels of corn or 750 gallons of spirits yield 1 gallon of fusel oil. It is used for the manufacture of lacquer and is essential to the hardware and brass goods industries. We should be exporters rather than importers of it.

These are some of the effects of our system of taxation of domestic spirits.

THE POLICY OF OTHER COUNTRIES.

England first began the policy of free methylated spirits for manufacturing purposes only in 1855, the compound consisting of 25 per cent methyl and 75 per cent ethyl alcohol. It was found to be expensive and the regulations irksome. In 1861 the scope of the law was enlarged, taking in all uses except for beverages and medicines and reducing the quantity of the denaturing material from 25 per cent to 10 per cent, but the burdensome supervision continued till 1891. Since that time this compound has been confined to manufacturing uses, and another compound known as "mineralized spirits" made by adding three-eighths of 1 per cent of mineral naphtha to the former mixture. In this form it is freely sold at retail. In addition pure spirit and special denaturing for special purposes is permitted.

It is fair to say that the use of methylated spirits in England has not been nearly as general nor the advantages derived from it anywhere nearly as great as in Germany. Owing to the high tax—about two and one-half times our own—the fear of frauds on the revenue caused the restrictions upon its use to be very severe and expensive. Instead of the system being placed under regulations to be prescribed from time to time by the revenue board and changed as experience and special conditions might justify, they were placed in the body of the law, so that they were rigid and inflexible. A year ago, driven to it by German competition, a commission was appointed by Parliament to recommend such changes as they might find necessary for a larger and more economical use of denatured spirits, and this bill before the House is in general accord with these recommendations, which are the result of fifty years of English experience and about twenty years of German success. With this bill enacted into law, and with regulations under it prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in substantial accord with those of England and Germany, there is not the slightest doubt but that the United States will have a decided advantage over our commercial rivals in the world's market in the use of this almost universal raw material, for while England can make alcohol at a somewhat lower price than Germany, we can easily beat them both in productive cost. Indeed, I am quite confident that the difference in cost will soon offset the bounty which the English commission recommends and which Germany is now paying.

In Germany, two principal methods of methylation are used, designated as "complete" and "incomplete."

The complete consists of 100 parts alcohol and 2½ parts of a mixture made of 4 parts of wood naphtha and 1 part pyridine base.

The incomplete, of 100 parts of ethyl and 5 parts of methyl alcohol.

There are also many special denaturants for special uses. The schedules may be changed by the federal council of the Empire, in accordance with changing conditions, and manufacturers' reports of consumption and products are required, as in England. The body of the law consists of but six lines of print.

In England the denatured spirit is prepared at the distilleries; in Germany, both by licensed methylators and at the factories where it is used.

The methylation at the distillery would seem to be the safer and more economical method, and is the plan specifically provided for in the present bill.

Germany began the system in 1888 with a consumption of 20,467,768 proof gallons, and in 1904 it had increased to 73,635,249 proof gallons, or nearly quadruple that of fifteen years ago.

France has an internal-revenue tax on spirits of $1.12½ per proof gallon. General denaturing consists of 10 parts wood spirit to 100 parts of ethyl alcohol. Many forms of special denaturants are allowed on approval of the ministry. For factory uses, denaturing is done at the factories under supervision. Since 1902 the Government has allowed from the general treasury a bounty of 5 cents per proof gallon to reduce the cost of spirit for fuel, light, and power.

In Switzerland the sale of spirits is a Government monopoly, the intention of the authorities being to secure a profit of about 50 cents per proof gallon.

Denatured alcohol is sold at cost, under the forms of "absolutely" and "relatively" denatured spirits, under regulations substantially similar to those of France.

Austria-Hungary has ordinary methylated spirit with a 2½ per cent adulterant, consisting of wood naphtha and pyridine bases, with special denaturants for special uses.

In Russia the sale of spirits is a Government monopoly, but duty-free denatured spirits are allowed under very liberal provisions prescribed by the minister of finance.

The general denaturant consists of 5 parts of wood naphtha with 1 part of pyridine bases to 100 parts of spirits. For street lighting it is 20 parts turpentine to 100 parts alcohol.

Holland allows both ordinary and special denaturing. The ordinary is with 1 part of wood to 8 parts of ethyl alcohol.

In Belgium total or partial remission of tax is given to denatured alcohol for manufacturing purposes only, but in seven years—from 1896 to 1902—the quantity used increased from 126,658 gallons to 924,421 gallons.

I have thus given the general conditions under which our principal commercial rivals use denatured alcohol wholly or partly free of tax, and in some cases aided by liberal bounties. Practically all commercial nations pursue a similar policy, except the United States, which of all others is qualified by the possession of the best and cheapest raw material and the highest inventive genius to make it the greatest success. Why do we not do it?

Most persons after a careful examination of the subject respond at once that there is but one side to the question and absolutely no argument against it. But three excuses for nonaction have been brought forward. Let me briefly consider them.

It is claimed—

First. It will cause a serious loss of revenue.

Second. It will be injurious to the temperance cause.

Third. It will be hurtful to the competing wood-alcohol industry.

If even a pretense of any other excuse can be conjured up, I should be glad to hear and answer it now.

And first, as to the revenue. There are but two ways in which the revenue can be affected:

First. By a substitution of tax-free for tax-paid alcohol in legitimate industries.

Second. By a restoration of denatured spirit and its fraudulent use.

So far as substitution is concerned, the mischief is already done, and the prophecy of Commissioner Wilson nine years ago, when he urged a tax of 55 cents a proof gallon on wood alcohol, is already fulfilled. He said then:

> Although the manufacturers do not admit that it is or can be used in beverages, they do urge its capability of replacing ethyl alcohol for many other purposes. And they claim that, if present conditions continue, in a very few years it will have superseded the taxed article entirely for all medicinal purposes where it is used externally. Should these expectations be realized, and from present indications there is no reason whatever to doubt their realization, a very serious deduction in the amount of tax collected from distilled spirits by this office must be anticipated.

The anticipation is already a reality, not only with relation to all lines of industries covered by this bill, but with many liquid preparations also. So that the question of revenue, both by the admission of the Secretary of the Treasury and the president of the wood-alcohol company, may be dismissed from serious consideration. The highest estimate of loss made by anybody was by Mr. M. N. Kline, of the Philadelphia Trades League, and he declared the outside figures to be $390,852 annually. I have heard another estimate, based upon the claims presented under section 61 of the Wilson law, naming $250,000 as the highest possible sum. In either case, it would be trivial compared with the advantages gained and would probably be more than offset by customs dues on increased importations of manufacturers' supplies.

Second. So far as frauds on the revenues are concerned, from recovery of the denatured spirits, is it not about time that the American people refused to acknowledge that they can not do at all what every other civilized nation is now doing successfully? After fifty-five years of experience in England, their commission reports "that when spirit is used for general and universal purposes, such as heating and lighting, the present mineralized methylated spirit is perfectly satisfactory both to the revenue and the public," and even recommend that their present regulations should be made "less stringent and more elastic."

All of the evidence shows that recovery is more difficult and much more expensive than the distillation of the spirit from the grain itself, and fraud has been practically suppressed in that line.

Last year alone, under existing law, 3,430,829 gallons of grape brandy were withdrawn from bond, tax free, to fortify sweet wine, and the law has been in effect for the past fourteen years, and to the extent of about 26,000,000 gallons withdrawn without frauds upon the revenue. The various Departments of the Government withdrew last year, free of tax, 2,113,389 gallons of alcohol, principally for the manufacture of smokeless powder. If it can be used in this way for beverages and munitions of war, why should it not be also for the arts and industries of the nation? There is no more danger of fraud in the one case than in the other.

The second objection is that it will be injurious to the temperance cause, but unfortunately for the soundness of this objection it is only advanced by the producers of untaxed wood alcohol and is absolutely nullified by the most sincere and earnest advocates of the temperance cause, not only in this country, but in Europe, where actual experience with denatured spirit laws justifies them in speaking authoritatively. I shall answer this objection by reading letters from some of the highest temperance authorities in the world, supplemented by equally good authorities in this country:

THE COTTAGE,
THE INDUSTRIAL FARM COLONY,
Duxhurst, Reigate, England, March 17, 1906.

DEAR SIR: Thank you for your letter of February 26. In reply I would say that I am strongly in favor of removing the tax from denatured alcohol. I believe alcohol of this sort is going to be one of the great factors in locomotion, and consequently I believe it to be a wrong thing and, from the temperance point of view, absurd. It is quite possible that people may drink methylated spirits in England under alcoholic madness, but I have also known them to drink parafin out of lamps, although such cases are rare, and legislation based upon such examples is not reasonable.

Believe me, yours, very truly, ISABEL SOMERSET.

W. JOHNSON, Esq.

LAUREL, MD., March 14, 1906.

Hon. E. J. HILL, M. C., Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: You will recall that when Mr. Pierce, of the Wood Products Company, was giving his testimony he introduced several clippings from English newspapers indicating that the people over there had gotten to drinking methylated spirits; that drunkenness ensued, and that the friends of temperance were opposed to the law.

I immediately wrote to Secretary Williams, of the United Kingdom Alliance, the strongest and most influential temperance organization in Great Britain, asking him if the stories put out by the wood-alcohol people were true. I have just received the inclosed cablegram rather fiercely denying the statements.

I am thinking that the original cablegram would be useful to you, so am inclosing it.

Respectfully, W. E. JOHNSON.

JOHNSON, Laurel, Md.:

Allegation of drunkenness and temperance party's attitude absolutely baseless. Barely one case published yearly.

WILLIAMS,
Secretary United Kingdom Alliance for Suppression of Liquor Traffic.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE LEAGUE,
Paternoster House, London, E. C., March 12, 1906.

DEAR MR. JOHNSON: I am much interested in your letter of February 24, and hasten to reply to the points you raise regarding methylated spirits. Methylated spirit consists in the United Kingdom of 90 per cent ethyl alcohol, rendered unfit for drinking purposes by the addition of 10 per cent of wood spirit (methyl alcohol) and three-eighths per cent of mineral naphtha. This spirit, under certain restrictions (quantity, storage, etc.), is sold duty free for burning, varnish making, and for manufacturing purposes. If the mineral naphtha is omitted, then the excise impose further restrictions, the object being to render the liquid unfit for consumption as a beverage. The presence of the mineral naphtha is easily proved by the addition of a few drops of the methylated spirit to water, when, if the naphtha is absent, nothing is observed, but if the naptha is present, the water becomes turbid. The presence of the naphtha has prevented the drinking of the methylated spirit excepting in some few rare and degraded cases. The fact that methylated spirit is free from duty has not in the slightest degree militated against temperance reform. As a matter of fact, the two things do not in this country come at all into conflict one with the other.

Yours, very truly, JOHN T. RAE, Secretary.

W. E. JOHNSON, Esq.

INTERNATIONAL ELECTORAL SUPERINTENDENT'S OFFICE,
Temperance Institute, Newcastle-on-Tyne, March 10, 1906.

DEAR MR. JOHNSON: Glad to hear from you again and hope you are well.

You may assure your friends that the methylated spirits don't trouble us here. It is all "bunkum" that "the cheap methylated spirits have played havoc with the temperance reform" in England. I never heard of a person being charged with drunkenness from using such spirits. I should like to see the cuttings from the papers you name, but I should say it is all a system of falsehood.

In England the same class of people declare that prohibition is a hugh failure in America, and thus they try and set off one country against another, so far as temperance reform is concerned. My policy is always to disbelieve these reports until I get some very direct and reliable information.

Kind regards. I am, very truly, GUY HAYLER.

LAUSANNE, March 12, 1906.

Mr. WILLIAM E. JOHNSON, Laurel, Md.

DEAR MR. JOHNSON: I have just received your letter of February 26 about the havoc the tax-free methylated or, better, denatured spirits would have caused in Switzerland.

I don't know which are the English papers in which the question is made notice of. What is sure is that we have no notion of it in Switzerland. I have never, never heard mentioned that the denatured spirits were, on any appreciable extent, drunk and that this feature of our monopoly law would have increased drunkenness.

The situation is the following:

The Swiss Federal Government regulates the quantity of alcohol to be distilled. It rectifies the alcohol to be drunk and sells it to wholesale liquor dealers at a high price. It denatures the alcohol destined for industrial purposes and sells it at cost price directly in quantities of at least 150 liters at the same time to bona fide manufacturers. The proceeding of selling "en gros" excludes completely the possibility of drinking, on a great scale, the denatured spirit. It is possible that an old drunkard, employed in a firm where denatured alcohol is used, steals a bottle of denatured spirit, but these are only exceptional cases. The control exerted by the Federal Government and the cantons is very strict, and fraud is almost impossible. This feature of our monopoly selling of denatured spirit for industrial purposes at a cost price is regarded by all temperance people as an excellent one, and we don't lose an occasion for pressing the utilization of alcohol for industrial purposes. It is its only legitimate use.

I remain at any time at your disposal.

Yours, faithfully, DR. R. HERCOD.

UNITED KINGDOM ALLIANCE,
LONDON AUXILIARY,
20 Tatull Street, Westminster, S. W., March 9, 1906.

DEAR MR. JOHNSON: In reply to your letter just to hand, I may say that there is no duty levied by our Government on methylated spirits, which are supposed to be undrinkable. As a matter of fact, they are sometimes drunk by seasoned drunkards, but the reports to which you refer which intimate that a considerable amount of drunkenness is thus caused are entirely fallacious. I have never yet heard of a single case in our London police courts where it came out in evidence that a man or woman convicted for drunkenness became drunk on methylated spirits. I have read occasionally of some districts where, on account of its cheapness, such spirit is consumed, but this form of the alcoholic evil is very limited, and does not bulge out into any public prominence.

Sincerely, yours, DAWSON BURNS.

W. E. JOHNSON, Esq.

CHRISTIANIA, March 15, 1906.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your kind letter of February 25, I have the pleasure of informing you that it can by no means be said that the people in Norway drink denatured spirits, or that the tax-free denatured spirits has "played havoc" with the temperance reform" or greatly increased drunkenness."

It occurs that very weak or deep-sunken individuals even use denatured spirits for intoxication, but only as perverse exceptions. If such use of denatured spirits had any extent, it must be regarded as sure that the temperance friends had been interested in finding measures against this drinking. This has not been the case.

The consumption of denatured spirits for industrial or scientific, etc., purposes has increased from about 582,000 liters in 1900 to about 891,000 in 1904; during the same time, a period of economically bad times, the consumption of alcohol in (not denatured) spirits, beer, and wine in Norway has decreased from 2.77 to 2.6 liters per inhabitant, and the number of arrests for drunkenness in our three largest cities decreased from 24,000 to 14,400.

Yours, very truly, A. TH. KIAER,
Secretary of Central Bureau of Statistics.

LES ANNALES ANTIALCOOLIQUES,
12 Rue de Conde, Paris, March 22, 1906.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: I have received your letter of February 28, relative to methylated spirits, as is called in France "denatured alcohol," for use in the industries. It is easy to reply to your questions. First, it is absurd to say that drinkers drink methylated alcohol. I do not know of a single example of this malady. Besides there is very little methyl alcohol manufactured in France, because the law having in view to facilitate the industrial use of ethyl alcohol has suppressed the duties on ethyl alcohol, which has been submitted to denaturization. Now, this denaturization consists in the mixture with ethyl alcohol of a nauseating substance, which renders the product undrinkable. This substance is ordinarily acetone. One would have to be insane in order to drink denatured alcohol. The English papers of which you speak have bluffed their readers. Second, all the temperance people, not only in France, but in all countries, are favorable to the industrial use of ethyl alcohol, because they consider that it is a practical means of fighting against alcoholism. They sum up their theory in these words, "It is better that alcohol should be burnt in the automobile than in the stomach." To favor alcohol for industrial use is a good thing to do, because it is a means of getting into the good graces of the manufacturers of alcohol. All the temperance papers are making a campaign in favor of industrial alcohol. In all the expositions of temperance congresses I have seen very fine exhibitions of machines destined for the use of industrial alcohol, in particular at Dresden and Budapest. Believe, my dear colleague, in my best sentiments.

DR. LE GRAIN.

ALCOHOL IN THE ARTS.

We made a mistake in opposing editorially the measure now before Congress placing denaturized alcohol on the free list. It is a measure favored by the leading temperance workers of the country, and with reason. It is not a saloon measure, but originated with manufacturers into whose processes alcohol enters. These are the makers of varnish, hats, soap, powder, paint, furniture, etc. They wish to use grain alcohol instead of wood alcohol and mineral naphtha and other costly, dangerous, and inferior substitutes. They should have it for that purpose. In addition, there is its use for heating, cooking, and for motors.

To be sure, the measure is favored by the distillers, for it gives them a new market; but it is a legitimate market, and no one objects to their entering it. A long-standing argument against prohibition is this: What will the farmers do with their grain if you abolish the liquor traffic? This increased use of alcohol in the arts will help to answer that argument.

The bill provides carefully for the chemical denaturizing of the alcohol before it is released from taxation. This process renders it absolutely and permanently undrinkable, and removes all objections to the bill that temperance workers could entertain.

THE EFFECTIVENESS OF ALCOHOL DENATURATION.

Crude wood naptha mixed with some of the pyridine bases, which come from the residium of coal tar, is among the more common agents for denaturing alcohol in Europe. The following letters from Prof. J. H. Long, professor of chemistry of the Northwestern University, and H. W. Wiley, Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture, both ex-presidents of the American Chemical Society, show how completely these chemical processes make this industrial alcohol nauseating and undrinkable:

U. S. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, BUREAU OF CHEMISTRY,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1906.

Mr. W. E. JOHNSON,
Editor Standard Encyclopedia of the Alcohol Problem,
Laurel, Md.

DEAR MR. JOHNSON: I am working now on a paper which I propose to bring before the Committee on Ways and Means on the subject of the use of tax-free alcohol in the arts. I will answer your questions as briefly as possible and in the manner which you request.

1. It is practicable to denaturize alcohol so as to make it undrinkable for the ordinary consumer. There are many persons, however, whose taste is so depraved and whose craving for alcohol is so great that they will drink it directly off of anatomical specimens. No amount of denaturing could prevent consumption of alcohol in this way, but the amount so consumed would be naturally very insignificant.

2. Alcohol is undrinkable when properly denatured because of its excessively bad taste and odor.

3. The skillful chemist is able, in most cases, to secure again a pure alcohol from the denatured product. This would not be possible, however, for the ordinary man untrained in chemical manipulations, and the cost of producing a drinkable alcohol from the denatured article would be far greater than paying the tax.

I feel very strongly that the use of tax-free alcohol for technical purposes can be permitted without sacrificing in any respects the interests of the Treasury in the matter.

Respectfully, H. W. WILEY, Chief.

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY MEDICAL SCHOOL,
Chicago, Ill., February 5, 1906.

Mr. WILLIAM E. JOHNSON,
Laurel, Md.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your questions about denaturing alcohol I will say this: Common ethyl alcohol may be very readily denatured so as to render it absolutely unfit for drink. For this purpose different materials have been used in different countries. In this respect the German laws have been the most perfectly worked out and are the most liberal.

Theoretically it is possible to refine or rectify this denatured alcohol so that it may be again converted into whisky, but this change can not be carried out economically or practically except by the use of complicated apparatus. It can not be done on a large scale without calling the attention of the United States revenue officials, and would be as easily detected as any other fraud against the Government.

The proposed law is a safe one, and the danger of furnishing a beverage to whisky consumers through its provisions is extremely remote. My point is that while this denatured alcohol can be rectified in a laboratory way, its wholesale rectification would be an extremely difficult matter, and a process easily detected. Of course you know that some topers will drink any crude material, even wood alcohol; denatured alcohol could be made even more unpalatable than the commercial wood alcohol on the market.

Yours, truly, J. H. LONG.

LEADING PROHIBITIONISTS INDORSE THE DENATURED-ALCOHOL MOVEMENT.

The movement for tax-free alcohol, chemically denaturized so as to be undrinkable, for industrial purposes has been agitated from time to time in this country for eighteen years. In that time not a temperance or prohibition organization of any kind has ever opposed it. Almost without exception every temperance reformer who has ever investigated the subject at all heartily indorses the movement as an economic reform of great value to the temperance cause. The following letters from four of the best-known conservative prohibition leaders of the country indicates the sentiment of the enemies of the saloon on this subject:

From Hon. Samuel Dickie, president of Albion College, vice-president of the New Voice Company, and for twelve years chairman of the national Prohibition committee.

PRESIDENT'S OFFICE, ALBION COLLEGE,
Albion, Mich., January 31, 1906.

Mr. WM. E. JOHNSON, Laurel, Md.

MY DEAR JOHNSON: I am in receipt of yours of January 29, and replying thereto allow me to say that I very heartily indorse the position you take. There is no just reason why the Government should impose a special tax on alcohol properly denatured and adapted only to mechanical and industrial uses. I think it will be a step in the right direction if such tax were removed.

Yours, truly, SAMUEL DICKIE.

From Dr. I. K. Funk, LL. D., of New York, editor in chief the Standard Dictionary, founder of the New Voice, etc.

EDITORIAL ROOMS OF THE STANDARD DICTIONARY,
New York, January 31, 1906.

Mr. WM. E. JOHNSON, Laurel, Md.

MY DEAR MR. JOHNSON: I am most heartily in favor of the removal of all taxation from alcohol when properly denaturized. It has been exceedingly shortsighted of our rulers in Washington to have so long permitted this industry to be so sorely handicapped. No good comes from this tax, except to Germany and other foreign countries, which are America's commercial rivals.

Yours, very truly, I. K. FUNK.

From Hon. Joshua Levering, the Maryland philanthropist, and Presidential nominee of the national Prohibition party in 1896.

E. LEVERING & CO.,
Baltimore, Md., January 31, 1906.

Mr. W. E. JOHNSON, Laurel, Md.

MY DEAR MR. JOHNSON: Yours of 29th instant duly to hand, with inclosures as stated, and some have had my attention. While I had not given the matter referred to much thought heretofore, I am favorably impressed with the view you present of it, and should think it desirable that a law, such as you outline, should be passed by Congress, containing, of course, proper restrictions and penalties to protect it from evasion.

Yours, truly, JOSHUA LEVERING.

From Hon. A. A. Stevens, president of the New Voice Company, and member of the national executive committee of the Prohibition party.

TYRONE, PA., February 1, 1906.

Mr. W. E. JOHNSON, 530 The Temple, Chicago Ill.

MY DEAR JOHNSON: I have yours of January 27 to hand, and contents noted. I have never given any attention to free alcohol denatured for industrial purposes. The whole proposition looks like a very sound one, and I can not see why it ought not to be developed. You know it is entirely out of my line. I am not a chemist, nor run in that line at all. It is an adjunct that can not help but produce good results. In any way I can aid you in the matter I will be glad to do so.

Very truly, yours, STEVENS.

THE PROPER USE OF ALCOHOL.

The following leading editorial was published in The New Voice, the leading prohibition organ of Chicago, in its issue of December 15, 1904. The editorial was written under the direction of the editor, Hon. John G. Woolley, was personally revised by him, and represents his views:

"In the foregoing pages is given a somewhat comprehensive survey of the movement for untaxed alcohol for use in the arts and industries. The Prohibitionists, as a rule, have paid no attention to this movement, neither favoring nor opposing it.

"But would not such a policy be of material advantage to the prohibition cause?

"Our war is not against either alcohol or the proper use of alcohol. We have no quarrel with the man who wishes alcohol to pickle snakes, to light his house, to drive his automobile, to manufacture hats, varnishes, shoes, enamels, dyestuffs, shellacs, lacquer, finish for pianos and organs, and a thousand things which enter into the manufactures of everyday life.

"We have no objection to any useful thing that can be done with alcohol. We place alcohol on the same plane with poisonous drugs and impure meat. We have no objection to the sale of impure meat for making soap, or fertilizer. But when poisonous drugs—cocaine, morphine, arsenic, etc.—are sold indiscriminately for improper purposes, or when the butcher attempts to market impure meat for eating, how quickly do the war dogs of justice swoop down on the offender! Why should we single out alcohol as an exception to this rule?

"Germany is now producing nearly 100,000,000 gallons of alcohol annually for industrial purposes. The United States has practically suppressed the manufacture of alcohol for proper purposes, and only produces about 12,000,000,000 gallons for all purposes, save in the form of whisky, beer, etc., and only about 1,000,000 gallons of this is used in manufacturing.

"We import our finest soaps, and many similar articles, because we have suppressed their manufacture here by our prohibitory tax on one of their important ingredients.

"The policy would not cause any appreciable loss of revenue, because, owing to the prohibitive tax, we get practically no revenue out of it anyhow.

"By allowing free alcohol, Germany has become the chemical laboratory of the world.

"Remove the tax on alcohol, when properly denaturized, and we shall not have to argue any more about what to do with the distilleries. Tell them to go ahead and make alcohol for proper purposes and quit selling it to make fools of men.

"There is probably not a distiller in the country who would not rather make alcohol for a legitimate and useful purpose than for a market that brings down on his head the bitter maledictions of half the human race.

"The proper way to cure a bad boy of his meanness is to kill the meanness and not kill the boy.

"We do battle against the saloon and not against the proper, legitimate use of alcohol.

"The United States has suppressed the use of alcohol for proper purposes, and gone into partnership with scoundrels who wax fat, drowsy, and wicked by marketing it for destructive and confessedly improper purposes.

"This policy needs reversing; suppress the improper use of alcohol and promote its use in the arts and industries."

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION,
Hartford, Conn., March 12, 1906.

Hon. EBENEZER J. HILL, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I take the liberty of dropping you a letter to say that I am heartily in favor of the bills now pending in Congress to take the tax off of alcohol for industrial purposes after it has been chemically denatured so as to be undrinkable. I believe I voice the sentiment of many of Hartford's best citizens when I say that I believe that the passage of these bills will do much for temperance reform, as well as for some of our manufacturing industries.

I sincerely trust that you will support these bills.

Respectfully, yours, NOEL H. JACKS.

Let me add my own opinion, that if there was no other justification for the passage of this law, the information gained by the separation now of the industrial uses of spirits and possibly later by the separation of medicinal uses under a different system, will for the first time in our history leave the beverage use segregated, so that it can be handled intelligently and free from all complications in the solving of our taxation problems in the future, and in that respect it is the wisest possible temperance legislation which could be devised.

The third objection is that it will be hurtful to the competing wood-alcohol industry. What is that industry? It is the destructive distillation of wood or the making of charcoal in retorts and the condensation of the smoke and vapor. The resulting product is pyroligneous acid, which, treated with lime, produces both acetate of lime and wood alcohol. The average cost of a cord of wood delivered at the works is $2.50. The products will be about 50 bushels of charcoal, at 5.2 cents, $2.60; 200 pounds of acetate of lime, at 1.39 cents, $2.78; 10 gallons of wood alcohol, at 32.3 cents, $3.23. Total, $8.61.

The industry first appeared in the Census of 1880. Prior to that time it was charcoal making only. To-day each of the two principal by-products exceed in value the one on which their production is based. The value of wood alcohol is purely a fictitious one, based not upon its cost of production, but wholly upon its possible use as a substitute for a much better alcohol made from grain, the price of which in the United States has been multiplied from 1,500 to 2,000 per cent by internal taxation. The wood alcohol is not taxed, and, being a poison, can not or should not be used for beverage purposes. The beverage use of grain alcohol is taxed in nearly all countries, and is by far the largest revenue producer under our internal-taxation system. But aside from such use, there is no more justification for taxing grain than wood alcohol, and no more reason for taxing either than there would be in taxing the corn or the oak trees from which they are made.

The industry is not a large one. According to the Census of 1900, there were 93 establishments producing crude wood alcohol, employing 1,487 persons and turning out a total valuation of all products of $3,833,266. According to the manufacturers' census of 1905, the production of wood alcohol, acetate of lime, and charcoal has increased in five years to $7,469,526. There were also nine other refining works only. The total capital invested in the 102 establishments was $6,717,699.

To all intents and purposes the industry is controlled by a corporation known as the Wood Products Company, of Buffalo, N. Y., and is probably as near to what is commonly known as a "trust" as anything of that kind in the country. Its president is H. J. Pierce, of Buffalo, and its selling agent, William S. Gray, of New York City. In 1896 Mr. Pierce testified before the Ways and Means Committee that his company—then the Manhattan Spirit Company—handled about 75 per cent of the crude wood alcohol production of the country. This year he testified as follows:

Mr. CLARK. Is it not true that your company absolutely controls the product of refined wood alcohol, both as to the price to the producer of raw or crude alcohol and the price that it is sold at to the consumer?
Mr. PIERCE. We refine about 75 per cent of all the wood alcohol made in the United States.
Mr. CLARK. You control the price absolutely?
Mr. PIERCE. To a large extent we do.
Mr. CLARK. You fix the price at both ends of the line?
Mr. PIERCE. We do to a large extent; but there are other large manufacturers.

At another point he testified as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any understanding about the price of 70 cents per gallon among the manufacturers?
Mr. PIERCE. Well, we try our best to regulate the figure.
The CHAIRMAN. At 70 cents a gallon?
Mr. PIERCE. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. That is general among the manufacturers of wood alcohol?
Mr. PIERCE. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding between them?
Mr. PIERCE. We have meetings at different times to talk matters over. There is considerable cutting of prices—that is, somebody will be getting a five-barrel price on a single barrel.

At another point questions were asked as to the price abroad, and it was shown that the price abroad delivered was less than in the home market. On page 144 is the following:

Mr. SMITH. What is the price of refined wood alcohol in Germany?
Mr. PIERCE. I think the price of refined wood alcohol in Germany is about 63 cents per gallon.
Mr. SMITH. Do you sell it at that; I understand that you are selling your product in Germany?
Mr. PIERCE. Over there they use denatured alcohol, and we sell our product in crude material. We ship only crude material there and they refine it up to such a point as they wish for denaturing purposes.
Mr. SMITH. How does the price at which you sell it in Germany for denaturing purposes compare with the price you get for it here?
Mr. PIERCE. It averages just about the same. At the present time the price we are getting for crude wood alcohol in Germany is 37 cents and here it is 40 cents.
Mr. SMITH. So that, as a matter of fact, it is a fact that the German Government is encouraging the use of denatured alcohol in the arts and manufactures, and that has not really operated to reduce the price of wood alcohol there; has it?
Mr. PIERCE. No, sir.
Mr. SMITH. So that it has really done your industry no harm?
Mr. PIERCE. No; not in Germany.
Mr. SMITH. You meet that situation as you find it there with a fair profit?
Mr. PIERCE. Yes, sir; we only sell wood alcohol for denaturing purposes there, and, of course, here we sell it for manufacturing purposes.

It should be noted that the testimony only covers the price in Germany at the present time, but I have the best possible information that the American product has been sold generally in Europe at from 25 to 30 cents per gallon. So that our present legislation has brought us to this condition, that we are taxing the better raw material at home to death, so that we are compelled, by a combination and monopoly, to pay the price which it may dictate for an inferior substitute, while this same monopoly is selling the substitute abroad at a lower price to our competitors to denature our own grain alcohol, shipped over there free of tax, to be used in manufacturing commodities which in some cases at least are shipped here and sold to us at far higher prices than they would cost if made at home under any reasonable legislation on this subject. Is it not high time that the law was changed?

The general fact is that for many years a combination of refiners has taken from most of the producers of the crude article their entire output at prices based on the market price of the refined spirit. Protected by the tax on grain alcohol the price is fixed by their own sweet will. One witness, Mr. Sharp, of the Ashland Iron Company, claiming to be an independent producer, testified:

Mr. SMITH. The Pierce-Stevens Company fixes the price substantially, does it not?
Mr. SHARP. Sometimes it has and sometimes not. It varies 5 or 10 cents a gallon, but as a rule there is an understanding as to the price.
Mr. SMITH. There is competition in the sale of alcohol, is there?
Mr. SHARP. Yes, sir; although I wish to be fair with you and say that where we can have an understanding we do so. Although it has been in our power all the time to boost it up, however, if we want to get together and put the price higher, to-day it is selling for about 50 cents a gallon less than it was ten years ago. The price of labor has a good deal to do with that, just as it did over in Germany, where this denatured product costs now 25 and 26 cents, and cost perhaps 22 cents three years ago. The amount of farm products they had cut quite a figure.

The contracts are based on the continuance of the tax on grain alcohol, and contain clauses terminating them in case Congress repeals it. Otherwise they continue in force so long as the producers sell exclusively to the combination.

The Oil, Paint and Drug Reporter, recently commenting on prices for the past four years, says, referring to 1905:

Wood alcohol was advanced sharply and unexpectedly in March, putting values at 70 cents for 95 per cent and 75 cents for 97 per cent, 10 cents above previous quotations. The increased demand and higher cost of labor and wood were stated as factors for the advance. One explanation that was associated with the change was that manufacturers were prompted by the fact that Congress could not consider the bill for untaxed alcohol until the fall. There was no prospect of any reaction from the higher level which distillers were able to maintain throughout the year.

The Journal of Commerce Bulletin, of New York, on March 13, 1905, contains the following:

The association of manufacturers, which is working for untaxed alcohol, feel they have a very strong object lesson that they will be able to use with advantage as soon as the new Congress assembles. Congress had adjourned less than a week before the market quotations on wood alcohol were advanced by the Wood Products Company, which practically controls the manufacture of this article, without, it is asserted, any justification in the form of changed trade conditions. The advance, which amounts to 10 cents a gallon, applies on all grades, and brings the price up to the basis of 70 cents a gallon for the 95 per cent grade. As is customary whenever the price changes, no reason was given for the advance by the company, which, being located at Buffalo, simply made the trade announcement through its New York agents, the William S. Gray Company.

In view of these quotations Mr. Sharp's claim of power "to boost it up" seems fairly correct.

In 1896 the combination was known as the "Manhattan Spirit Company," and, with an annual business of $800,000, was capitalized at $4,000,000. Its successor, the Wood Products Company, is better organized. Its capital is $1,600,000 and no bonded indebtedness. It is now and for several years has been paying 8 per cent dividends, and on January 1, 1905, had a surplus of $187,948. It is evidently a very successful concern, and now on a legitimate basis of capitalization, and if the names of the directors of the company give any indications of its business relationships, it is not on terms of bitter hostility either with the crude-spirit producers or the Standard Oil Company.

With this extended explanation of the conditions under which the business is conducted, let us inquire as to whether this legislation will be hurtful to them.

Perhaps it might be a more pertinent question to ask whether it would not rather be helpful to the great army of consumers to permit them to buy a safer, better, and cheaper commodity of general use, instead of forcing them through the taxing power to purchase from a monopoly a poisonous and less effective substitute at a more than double price; but this needs no demonstration on my part. The people are answering that for themselves in the enormous mass of petitions which are flooding Congress to-day.

It might also be pertinent to ask whether, regardless of the results, we have a right, either moral or economic, to use the taxing power to benefit one legitimate domestic industry at the expense of another. We all know of one instance where an artificial inferior substitute has been taxed for the benefit of a superior natural product, but this is the only case I know of where a tax is maintained upon an admittedly superior and cheaper natural product for the benefit of an inferior and more expensive one.

I suppose no one will deny that with both put on equal competitive terms all of the wood alcohol which is now made or which may be made in the future can be readily and freely sold at about the same price which untaxed ethyl alcohol will bring. What right has anybody to demand or claim more than this? What right has anybody to insist that conditions shall longer continue under which 80,000,000 consumers shall be forced to pay tribute to a highly refined and concentrated essence of monopoly, or that the farmer, the largest producing class, shall be sacrificed for one of the smallest, the wood-alcohol producer. Rather let each work out his own salvation, on equal terms and an even footing.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the wood-alcohol producer or refiner is to be injured in any degree by this legislation, but that rather because of it the demand for his product will be increased.

A census of manufactures in the United States was taken last year. For the wood-alcohol industry it covered the production of 1904, except in Michigan, where, in cooperation with the State authorities, it was taken in 1903. The sheets relating to that industry have been withdrawn and tabulations made and the conclusions verified by supplementary correspondence. I submit them herewith, as furnished by the Census Bureau, under date of April 10, 1906. It is almost needless to state that both quantities and values represent totals of figures given by the persons engaged in the industry.

Wood distillation for 1904, being Census of 1905.

WOOD ALCOHOL.

SUMMARY.

Production of wood alcohol, acetate of lime, and charcoal for the year 1904, except for Michigan, which is for 1903.

	Quantity.	Value.
Wood alcohol (the amount being gallons of 82 per cent crude and the value being total for crude and refined at factory) ..... gallons	8,282,285	$3,733,662
Acetate of lime ..... tons	55,192	1,527,733
Charcoal ..... bushels	42,512,857	2,208,131
Total		7,469,526

Capital invested in wood distillation for census of 1900.

	Number.	Capital.
Establishments producing crude alcohol only	84	$4,858,824
Establishments producing crude alcohol and refining it	9	760,156
Establishments refining product of other establishments	9	1,098,719
Total	102	6,717,699

They show total production of crude wood alcohol, 8,282,285 gallons, valued at 32.3 cents per gallon. Of this amount there was required for refining purposes, 7,345,191 gallons; total crude to be marketed, 937,094 gallons. The refined product netted 5,876,153 gallons, valued at 58.4 cents per gallon, which, added to the crude remainder, as above, leaves a total of crude and refined to be marketed, 6,813,247 gallons. Of this total there was exported of crude and refined, at an average valuation of 49 cents per gallon, 1,194,466 gallons, leaving for use in this country 5,618,781 gallons. Deduct amount required for manufacture of formaldehyde and other things which can only be made from wood alcohol, 1,000,000 gallons, it leaves in a competitive market 4,618,781 gallons.

Now, it should be borne distinctly in mind that the proposed legislation does not touch liquid medicinal uses, patent medicines, hair washes, perfumeries, Florida water, bay rum, and many other liquid preparations in which it is well known that the high distillations of wood alcohol under the names of Lion d'Or, Spirit, Eagle Spirit, Columbian Spirit, and Imperial Spirit are used. It will still hold this field free of tax and with no competitor but domestic alcohol taxed at $2.08 per gallon. Is it not fair to assume that at least one-half of the remainder will continue to find its field of usefulness and market there, leaving at the outside not more than 3,000,000 gallons to be cared for. and thus prevent the fall of its selling price to a competitive basis? Now, it is a well-known fact that the best denaturant for grain alcohol is wood alcohol, and that it is in general use for that purpose throughout the world. The quantity required varies from 2½ to 10 per cent, according to the use to which the denatured spirit is put. Under this bill, as in most other countries, this is a subject of regulation to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The probabilities are, however, that for manufacturing purposes at least 90 per cent of the denatured spirit will contain 10 per cent of wood alcohol. The whole question therefore of the maintenance of the present price of wood alcohol depends upon whether enough denatured spirit is consumed to require for methylation purposes about 3,000,000 gallons of wood alcohol.

In 1860, with untaxed grain alcohol, we used about 1 gallon per capita. It was before the days of automobiles, motor boats, farm machinery, and the thousand and one uses to which the small internal-explosion engine is now put. Is it unreasonable to assume that the consumption now would be at least as great?

One gallon per capita now would mean a consumption annually of 85,000,000 gallons.

Cut it down one-half, or even two-thirds, and it is doubtful whether the present supply of wood alcohol would be sufficient to meet the demand.

But put the problem in another way. Leave out of consideration the entire demand for denatured spirit for manufacturing purposes. Ignore the requirements for new industries which are now impossible here, and for the return to the United States of old ones which have been driven out by the enormous tax, and confine the query to the single field of fuel, light, and power.

The fact is established beyond dispute that with two lamps of an equal lighting capacity, a gallon of alcohol will last nearly twice as long as a gallon of kerosene.

The fact is also established that for power purposes, while the volume of consumption of gasoline and alcohol in the internal-combustion engine is about the same, the efficiency of alcohol is about 30 per cent, as against 21 per cent for gasoline.

Last year this country consumed—

Of kerosene	gallons	534,001,500
Of gasoline	do	262,873,700
Total	do	796,875,200

It is shown by the census of 1905 that the demand is increasing far more rapidly than the supply. During the past five years the supply of kerosene increased 9.6 per cent and the value 23½ per cent. During the same time the supply of gasoline increased 3½ per cent and the value 33⅓ per cent. Everything points to a far more rapidly increasing demand in the future than is shown in the past. In view of these facts, is it unreasonable to assume that denatured alcohol, at a cost of from 10 to 20 cents per gallon, according to the price of corn, will displace at least 10 per cent of the present consumption of kerosene and gasoline? If it did, it would mean an annual requirement of 80,000,000 gallons, saying nothing of the annual increase. If it only displaced half of that quantity, there would not be wood alcohol enough for denaturing purposes.

In 1904 Germany used 36,817,624 wine gallons of denatured alcohol for industrial purposes. Assuming her population to be 50,000,000 and ours 85,000,000 and the consumption of the two nations to be alike, we should use 62,589,961 gallons. But the extravagance, wastefulness, and reckless expenditure of the American people along every line, as compared with the forced economy and prudent expenditure of the German people, point inevitably to a much larger per capita consumption here than there.

But, Mr. Speaker, if we fell far behind Germany and every other nation in the use of this natural product of ours for fuel, light, and power, this legislation placed upon our statute books would be of untold value to 85,000,000 consumers here as a controlling and steadying force, and an available check upon the rapidly increasing prices for their products, made by the oil and coal companies, the greatest, most powerful, and most successful monopolies of modern times. If we accomplish nothing else but this, we shall not have labored in vain.

Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the exporting manufacturer who is compelled to compete in the world's markets with those of other nations where free alcohol is utilized, in behalf of the farming producer who has a right to the wider market for the products of his farm, which this legislation will bring, as an incentive to the economy which will surely result from the utilization of waste products in the increased manufacture of alcohol here, and more than all in behalf of the 85,000,000 of consumers of this product in the arts and industries and for fuel, light, and power, I ask from the Fifty-ninth Congress that this tax may be removed and that this nation may be put on an equality with the other commercial nations of the world in the keen contest which is now being carried on for the industrial supremacy of the globe.

Indian Appropriation Bill.

OF

HON. JOSEPH HOWELL,

OF UTAH,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, March 8, 1906.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 15331) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907—

Mr. HOWELL of Utah said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I desire to bring to the attention of the committee the situation of the Uintah and White River Indians in Utah. There are at present about 1,600 of these Indians, and until recently they occupied the so-called "Uintah Reservation" in said State. This reservation comprised an area of 2,432,000 acres. The act of May 27, 1902, provides, among other things, that—

The Secretary of the Interior, with the consent thereto of the majority of the adult male Indians of the Uintah and White River tribes of Ute Indians, to be ascertained as soon as practicable by an inspector, shall cause to be allotted to each head of a family 80 acres of agricultural land, which can be irrigated, and 40 acres of land to each other member of said tribes, said allotments to be made prior to October 1, 1903, on which date all the unallotted lands within said reservation shall be restored to the public domain: Provided, That persons entering any of said land under the homestead law shall pay therefor at the rate of $1.25 per acre: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall impair the rights of any mineral lease which has been approved by the Secretary of the Interior or any permit heretofore issued by direction of the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with said Indians for a mineral lease; but any person or company having so obtained such approved mineral lease or such permit to negotiate with said Indians for a mineral lease on said reservation, pending such time and up to thirty days before said lands are restored to the public domain as aforesaid, shall have in lieu of such lease or permit the preferential right to locate under the mining laws not to exceed 640 acres of contiguous mineral land, except the Raven Mining Company, which may in lieu of its lease locate 100 mining claims of the character of mineral mentioned in its lease; and the proceeds of the sale of the lands so restored to the public domain shall be applied, first, to the reimbursement of the United States for any moneys advanced to said Indians to carry into effect the foregoing provisions, and the remainder, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall be used for the benefit of said Indians. And the sum of $70,064.48 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid to the Uintah and White River tribes of Ute Indians, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, whenever a majority of the adult male Indians of said tribes shall have consented to the allotment of lands and the restoration of the unallotted lands within said reservation as herein provided.

Said item of $70,064.48 to be paid to the Uintah and White River Utes covers claims which these Indians have made on account of the allotment of lands on the Uintah Reservation to Uncompahgre Indians and from which the Government has received from said Uncompahgre Indians money aggregating $60,064.48; and the remaining $10,000 claimed by the Indians under an act of Congress detaching a small part of the reservation on the east, and under which act the proceeds of the sale of the lands were to be applied for the benefit of the Indians.

The opening of said reservation did not occur as provided for by this act, but was postponed from time to time by several subsequent acts of Congress. The first of these was passed on June 19, 1902, about three weeks after the act above quoted, and was known as "Joint resolution 31." It contained, among other things, this clause:

In addition to the allotments in severalty to the Uintah and White River Utes of the Uintah Indian Reservation, in the State of Utah, the Secretary of the Interior shall, before any of said lands are opened to disposition under any public land law, select and set apart for the use in common of the Indians of that reservation such an amount of non-irrigable grazing lands therein, at one or more places, as will subserve the reasonable requirements of said Indians for the grazing of live stock.

All allotments hereafter made to Uncompahgre Indians of lands in said Uintah Indian Reservation shall be confined to agricultural land which can be irrigated, and shall be on the basis of 80 acres to each head of a family and 40 acres to each other Indian, and no more. The grazing selected and set apart as aforesaid in the Uintah Indian Reservation for the use in common of the Indians of that reservation shall be equally open to the use of all Uncompahgre Indians receiving allotments in said reservation of the reduced area here named.

It will be observed that originally provision was made for throwing open to entry this reservation on October 1, 1903. The Indian appropriation bill approved March 3, 1903, provided, however, that the date of the opening be deferred for one year—that is to say, to October 1, 1904—and otherwise modified the provisions of joint resolution 31, already referred to, in the following language:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to do the necessary surveying and otherwise carry out the purposes of the act of May 27, 1902, making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for the fiscal year 1903, and for other purposes, as provides for the allotments of the Indians of the Walker River Reservation, in Nevada, and the Uintah and White River Utes, in Utah, and the joint resolution of June 19, 1902, providing for the allotment of the Indians of Spokane Reservation, in Washington, to be immediately available, $175,000: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Interior shall forthwith send an inspector to obtain the consent of the Uintah and White River Ute Indians to an allotment of their lands, as directed by the act of May 27, 1902, and if their consent as therein provided can not be obtained by June 1, 1903, then the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be allotted to each of said Uintah and White River Ute Indians the quantity and character of land named and described in said act: And provided further, That the grazing lands to be set apart for the use of the Uintah, White River Utes, and other Indians, as provided by public resolution No. 31, of June 19, 1902, be confined to the lands south of the Strawberry River, on said Uintah Reservation, and shall not exceed 250,000 acres: And provided further, That the time for opening the unallotted lands to public entry on said Uintah Reservation, as provided by the act of May 27, 1902, be, and the same is hereby, extended to October 1, 1904.

That in the lands within the former Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, in the State of Utah, containing gilsonite, asphaltum, elaterite, and other like substances, which were reserved from location and entry by provision in the act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes," approved June 7, 1897, all discoveries and locations of any such mineral lands by qualified persons prior to January 1, 1891, not previously discovered and located, who recorded notices of such discoveries and locations prior to January 1, 1891, either in the State of Colorado or in the office of the county recorder of Uintah County, Utah, shall have all the force and effect accorded by law to locations of mining claims upon the public domain. All such locations may hereafter be perfected, and patents shall be issued therefor upon compliance with the requirements of the mineral-land laws: Provided, That the owners of such locations shall relocate their respective claims and record the same in the office of the county recorder of Uintah County, Utah, within ninety days after the passage of this act. All locations of any such mineral lands made or recorded on or subsequent to January 1, 1891, are hereby declared to be null and void; and the remainder of the lands heretofore reserved as aforesaid because of the mineral substances contained in them, in so far as the same may be within even-numbered sections, shall be sold and disposed of in tracts not exceeding 40 acres, or a quarter of a quarter of a section, in such manner and upon such terms and with such restrictions as may be prescribed in a proclamation of the President of the United States issued for that purpose not less than one hundred and twenty days after the passage of this act, and not less than ninety days before the time of sale or disposal, and the balance of said lands and also all the mineral therein are hereby specifically reserved for future action of Congress.

On February 6, 1904, the honorable Secretary of the Interior, in a communication addressed to the chairman of the House Committee on Indian Affairs, requested that the time for opening the reservation be again extended, this time to October 1, 1905, which request was based on a letter from the honorable Commissioner of the General Land Office to the effect that the necessary surveys of the reservation could not be completed, and the required allotments made by the date previously fixed. The House acceded to his request by incorporating such a provision in the Indian appropriation bill; the Senate, however, amended this provision by fixing March 10 as the date for the opening. This amendment finally carried. The particular clause bearing on this subject is as follows:

That the time for opening the unallotted lands to public entry on the Uintah Reservation in Utah, as provided by the acts of May 27, 1902, and March 3, 1903, be, and the same is hereby, extended to March 10, 1905, and $5,000 is hereby appropriated to enable the Secretary of the Interior to do the necessary surveying, and otherwise carry out the purposes of so much of the act of May 27, 1902, making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for the fiscal year 1903, and for other purposes, as provides for the allotment of the Uintah and White River Utes in Utah.

This act was again modified by the act of March 3, 1905, which made provision for the final disposition of these lands, and is as follows:

That so much of the act of March 3, 1903, as provides that the grazing lands to be set apart for the use of the Uintah, White River Utes, and other Indians on the Uintah Reservation, as provided by public resolution No. 31, of June 19, 1902, shall be confined to the lands south of the Strawberry River, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

That the time for opening to public entry the unallotted lands on the Uintah Reservation in Utah having been fixed by law as the 10th day of March, 1905, it is hereby provided that the time for opening said reservation shall be extended to the 1st of September, 1905, unless the President shall determine that the same may be opened at an earlier date and that the manner of opening such lands for settlement and entry, and for disposing of the same, shall be as follows: That the said unallotted lands, excepting such tracts as may have been set aside as national forest reserve, and such mineral lands as were disposed of by the act of Congress of May 27, 1902, shall be disposed of under the general provisions of the homestead and town-site laws of the United States, and shall be opened to settlement and entry by proclamation of the President, which proclamation shall prescribe the manner in which these lands may be settled upon, occupied, and entered by persons entitled to make entry thereof; and no person shall be permitted to settle upon, occupy, or enter any of said lands, except as prescribed in said proclamation, until after the expiration of sixty days from the time when the same are thereby opened to settlement and entry: Provided, That the rights of honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors of the late civil and the Spanish war or Philippine insurrection, as defined and described in sections 2304 and 2305 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 1, 1901, shall not be abridged: And provided further, That all lands opened to settlement and entry under this act remaining undisposed of at the expiration of five years from the taking effect of this act shall be sold and disposed of for cash, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, not more than 640 acres to any one person. The proceeds of the sale of such lands shall be applied as provided in the act of Congress of May 27, 1902, and the acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto.

That before the opening of the Uintah Indian Reservation the President is hereby authorized to set apart and reserve as an addition to the Uintah Forest Reserve, subject to the laws, rules, and regulations governing forest reserves, and subject to the mineral rights granted by the act of Congress of May 27, 1902, such portion of the lands within the Uintah Indian Reservation as he considers necessary, and he may also set apart and reserve any reservoir site or other lands necessary to conserve and protect the water supply for the Indians or for general agricultural development, and may confirm such rights to water thereon as have already accrued: Provided, That the proceeds from any timber on such addition as may with safety be sold prior to June 30, 1920, shall be paid to said Indians in accordance with the provisions of the act opening the reservation.

That the Raven Mining Company shall, within sixty days from the passage of this act, file for record, in the office of the recorder of deeds of the county in which its claims are located, a proper certificate of each location; and it shall also, within the same time, file in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, in the city of Washington, said description and a map showing the locations made by it on the Uintah Reservation, Utah, under the act of Congress of May 27, 1902 (Stat. L., vol. 32, p. 263); and thereupon the Secretary of the Interior shall forthwith cause said locations to be inspected and report made, and if found to contain the character of mineral to which said company is entitled by the act of Congress aforesaid and that each of said claims does not exceed the size of a regular mining claim, to wit, 600 by 1,500 feet, he shall issue a patent in fee to the Raven Mining Company for each of said claims: Provided further, That the Florence Mining Company, entitled under the act of Congress approved May 27, 1902, to the preferential right to locate not to exceed 640 acres of contiguous mineral land in the Uintah Reservation, Utah, shall, within sixty days from the passage of this act, file in the office of the recorder of deeds of the county in which its location is made a proper description of its claim, and it shall within the same time file in the office of the Secretary of the Interior said description and a map showing the location made by it on the Uintah Reservation, Utah, and thereupon the Secretary of the Interior shall forthwith cause said location to be inspected and report thereon made, and if found not to exceed 640 acres he shall issue a patent in fee to said company for the said land: And provided further, That the extension of time for opening the unallotted lands to public entry herein granted shall not extend the time to make locations to any person or company heretofore given a preferential right, but the Raven Mining Company and the Florence Mining Company pending the time for opening to public entry the Uintah Reservation shall have the right of ingress and egress to and from their respective properties over and through said reservation.

In pursuance of the provisions of these several acts, disposition of the lands comprised in the reservation was made as follows:

	Acres.
Added to the Uintah Forest Reserve	1,010,000
Allotted to the Indians under terms of act	103,265
Reserved for grazing	249,220
Reserved for Reclamation Service	60,313
Reserved for military occupation	3,800
Reserved for Florence Mining Company	640
Restored to public domain	1,004,000
Total	2,432,000

Those lands restored to the public domain became subject to homestead entry on September 1, 1905, but the right to enter said lands was for a period of sixty days confined to such as had been fortunate enough to obtain it in the drawing arranged for by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. At the close of the sixty-day period—that is to say, beginning with November 1, 1905—all restrictions were removed, resulting in the remaining lands being open to anybody's entry under the homestead laws. During the sixty-day limited entry period over 1,300 entries were made, aggregating some 200,000 acres.

With the advent of spring there will undoubtedly be a large influx of people to that region, from the fact that only a portion of the lands possessing agricultural capabilities are yet taken up. And the first question that will confront the settlers in the spring is that of securing a sufficient water supply for irrigation. All the lands that will be brought under cultivation must be irrigated—those of the Indians as well as the less choice lands of the white settlers. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has already called attention to the necessity of securing for the Indians an adequate water supply, as appears from his letter printed in yesterday's RECORD; if his suggestions regarding the matter are not heeded, and the Government makes no provisions for watering the allotted lands of the Indians, it is contended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that there is every reason to fear that the entire available water supply will be appropriated by the whites, to the serious loss of the Indians. The present policy of the Department of the Interior is to circumvent the white settlers in their attempts on the water by refusing the necessary rights of way for the canals and ditches across the grazing lands of the Indians, which latter have been invariably chosen along the margins of the streams, and to a great extent holds the key to the diversion of these streams for irrigation.

If this policy be persevered in, it will spell disaster for the white settlers, who have entered on these lands in perfect good faith, for it will prevent them from irrigating their lands; and without water these same lands are like those of the arid region—barren and desert.

The amendment which I propose involves no new departure on the part of Congress; it has an exact counterpart in an appropriation made by the Fifty-eighth Congress for an irrigation project in behalf of the Pima Indians in Arizona. The bill now under discussion even provides for an additional appropriation for the furtherance of said project. The wisdom and urgency of this legislation is unquestioned; and I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the claims of the Uintah Indians rest upon as solid a foundation as those of the tribe I have just mentioned.

. The Secretary of the Interior has recommended an appropriation of $600,000 to provide an irrigation system for the Indian allotted lands, this money to be paid back to the Government from the proceeds of the sale of said lands.

By the provisions of the act which restores the reservation lands to the public domain, the proceeds from the sale thereof are to be used for the benefit of the Indians under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. What wiser or more permanent benefit can be bestowed upon these Indians than for the Government generously to anticipate the proceeds sure to be realized and to secure therewith while there is opportunity a sufficient water supply for these allotted lands. Such prudent action on the part of the Government would make these lands ideally fruitful and productive, and in so doing would insure to the Indians and their descendants for all time an ample means of support.

We have deprived them of the great bulk of the lands which they formerly occupied without restriction or restraint. The two million and odd acres which have been taken from them and disposed of, according to the provisions of law, furnish an ample guaranty that the money which my amendment calls for will be refunded to the Treasury of the United States.

Such a use of this fund would be infinitely wiser than an annual per capita disbursement. It would put the Indians in the way of becoming productive and accustom them to the ways of civilized industry. The lands which have been allotted to them in severalty, together with a sufficient water supply, would enable those too old or infirm to till the soil to lease on shares to the white settlers. The results achieved by the cultivation of these lands would prove an object lesson to the Indians and furnish them a strong incentive to emulate the industry and methods of the thrifty white man.

Fairness and justice demand that the Indians shall secure a primary right to sufficient water to irrigate their allotted lands. No one denies this right or would seek to deprive them of it, but now is certainly the appointed time for the Government to act in their behalf. The white settlers fully recognize the claims of the Indians to the necessary water supply, but are anxious that their necessities in this respect shall be speedily determined so that there shall be no further obstruction to the appropriation and use of the surplus waters.

These waters are subject to appropriation under the laws of the State of Utah, in which State the modern system of irrigation had its origin. Long experience and numerous court decisions have resulted in perfecting to a high degree the various irrigation laws in that State, nor can any person successfully challenge the justice or wisdom of these laws. The rights of the Indians under the solicitous care of the Indian Bureau will be amply secure, and there need be no friction or conflict of rights.

I am sure the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the committee, has a misapprehension of the objects to be attained by the amendment; his observations in the course of his remarks on this subject, to the effect that this project involves more of benefit to the white settlers than to the Indians, show a complete absence of correct and accurate information on the particular question involved. I will say to him now that the white settlers are asking just those rights which have heretofore been freely accorded the hardy pioneer and home builder wherever he has penetrated the wilderness—the right to utilize the natural resources and elements that surround him that he may thereby redeem the waste places and make them to blossom as the rose. In the present instance these pioneers ask only the privilege of diverting the streams from their natural channels in order to bring them in beneficent courses on the parched and thirsty land to make it fruitful.

But this is the condition that confronts these brave frontiersmen: The Government has invited them to occupy and settle these lands and they, having done so, are confronted by an arbitrary and absolute refusal to make effective any appropriation of water which they may make. Without water these lands are like those in many other portions of the West, which is to say, of little value; with water, however, they will yield rich returns to reward the patient husbandman for his toil.

Wherefore, then, this deaf ear to so righteous a plea, this indifference to a situation so obviously needful of relief? Can it be that this dog-in-the-manger policy will meet the approval of this committee?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hold to the view that it is the solemn duty of the Government, in its rôle of guardian to the Indians, to relieve the situation. Let us therefore promptly provide for a system of irrigation for these Indians' allotted lands and remove all obstacles from the pathway of the white settlers who already have enough of the forbidding to overcome without being harried and harassed by the Government.

This Uintah country is as rich in natural endowments as any portion of my State and as promising in bounteous returns; there is quite an abundance of water for power purposes, as well as for irrigation; it lies in the pathway of a projected and already partially constructed railway from the East; all this taken in conjunction with its other vast mining resources and stock-raising and agricultural possibilities, as yet practically untouched, are sure to make it in a short time one of the most populous and prosperous communities in the State.

Reorganization of the Consular Service.

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. WILEY,

OF NEW JERSEY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 19, 1906,

On the bill (S. 1345) to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Last week there was an assemblage in this city, composed of men eminent in business and in manufactures, who came from all parts of this country. No one could look into their faces without being impressed by their intelligence and earnestness. Their mission was to urge upon Congress the necessity for reform in the consular service, both as to the character of its officials and their methods of procedure. It was my privilege to be asked to address this body, and it was at once a compliment and an opportunity. The question had presented itself to me on various occasions and under a variety of circumstances—in fact, every American who has been in foreign countries and observed commercial matters must have been impressed with the attention the consuls of other nations give to questions affecting their interests, and, if he comes in personal contact with them, with the care with which they seem to have been trained for their work. If he investigates further, he will find that many of them have been for years holding various positions in the consular service and have been promoted for merit. If he pursues the same investigation in the case of our own representatives, he will find in most cases that the reverse is true. I sincerely hope this question of reform will be agitated on the floor of this House and elsewhere, in the press, and on the platform, till an adequate remedy is found and applied without fear or favor. It is admitted on all sides that the reform is urgently needed, and I see no suitable reason why any delay should be necessary.

I had occasion last year to visit some eight foreign countries, where I followed my custom of many years' standing and visited our ambassadors and consuls, talking with them on the subject of consular conditions. This method ought to be considered as a duty by the American citizen who really has the welfare of his country at heart, since it enables him to acquire useful knowledge, while it shows to the representative abroad that his fellow-citizens are interested in his work.

As a rule, most Americans call on their representative only when they have gotten into some scrape, or else when they wish to bespeak his good offices for tickets to some function or for a presentation to some potentate. As an evidence of how our consuls compare with those of other nations I will cite but one instance, which came under my own observation. Others could be adduced if necessary. Another American citizen and I, being anxious to obtain some statistics as to the consumption of ferromanganese, went to an American consul-general, who told us without shame that he had not these statistics, but we could get them at the German consul's; and we had to conceal our blushes and ask a favor of that gentleman, who gave us the desired information quite cheerfully.

It behooves this body to consider this question carefully, for the boards of trade and chambers of commerce all over this country have taken the matter up in a most earnest manner, and are insisting on Congressional action. Last fall I published a short article on the subject, and received letters from these organizations in all parts of this country, urging the matter on Congress as one of the greatest importance. Our country is a producer and manufacturer far beyond the needs of its citizens, and is reaching out for foreign trade all over the world. The consuls by their representations and reports are the means of stimulating such trade, and as they represent us in a foreign land so is this nation judged by the people of that land. From this it naturally follows that our consuls should be especially trained for their duties, and should have command of more than one language. They should be familiar with international law, with questions of political economy, and should be thoroughly equipped for their work. This is really a matter of several years' training, and demands a college of diplomacy on lines similar to those of the War College. No one should be appointed to a subordinate position even until either he has the degree from this institution or has passed its examination. He should then be promoted as he shows capacity and fidelity. In other words, men should go to the consular service because they are fit for such work, and should not receive an appointment as a reward for political services or because of any influence their friends may possess.

The consular pay should be such as to enable the recipient to live properly and respectably. At present this service is most inadequately paid, and the result is that competent men often refuse to take the place, and we find rich men's sons or their poor relatives occupying positions which demand great ability.

I regretted very much to hear to-day on the floor of this House criticisms as to the pay proposed under this bill for the consular service. The very critics know that it is impossible in any business to get suitable employees unless they receive suitable compensation. What possible incentive has any young man to enter this service with its present salary list? This country can not afford, for its own sake, to be represented by underpaid consuls. The wonder has been that we have been able to keep in this service some of the splendid men who adorn it—for I must not be understood to be condemning the service in a wholesale fashion. I saw many a consul who was thoroughly equipped for his work, and, better still, the results of such equipment showed in the character of the work he was doing. In one instance—in Spain, where of all nations we need to produce the very best impression—I found our consul-general to be a man of education and of letters, able to converse fluently in four languages. He had been fifteen years in the service and was trained in every detail of his department. Yet in the same country I found a consul who had scarcely any knowledge of the English language. In Italy, after spending two hours in the effort to find our consul, and being sent to the South American consuls and to one consulate of Great Britain, I found our representative through the aid of a German. His house was sheltered by a most disreputable American eagle, which looked as though it had been through a clothes wringer, and when I told of my troubles I asked why he was not in the directory with the other foreign consuls. Our consul smiled sweetly and remarked: "Ah! I speak no English; only Italian." When I found that he received the munificent sum of $75 per annum I did not feel that we were entitled to a linguist.

In addition to obtaining information of use to business men of this nation, our consuls not infrequently represent us on official occasions, and our country is judged by the impression they produce on the foreigner. This brings up another question. Our consuls should wear a uniform, varying with the grade they represent. It should be unostentatious, but distinctive, and should be worn on diplomatic occasions. Even our distinguished ambassadors have been taken for attendants because of their severe black dress suits. "Republican simplicity" sounds well, but "in Rome do as the Romans do," and as other nations prescribe a consular dress we should certainly range ourselves beside them if we are to compete with them.

We uniform our Army and our Navy, and the men are proud to wear the uniform. I am quite sure that a similar feeling will be developed if we have the right men in the consular service; the uniform would always serve to make the wearer feel his position and be careful of his conduct.

The President and the State Department should have absolute control over the appointment or removal of all consuls, and over their promotion. As well expect an army to be officered by politicians and its affairs conducted by them as to have this great army of diplomats thus conducted. Many an occasion may arise where tact and diplomacy may prevent the need of invoking the Army or Navy. The nation applied the political methods to the Army of 1861 and learned a most costly lesson, and one never to be forgotten, enforced by defeats and unnecessary loss of valuable lives, due to the command being given to political soldiers. But, as always, this nation finds an effective remedy, as it did in the latter part of our civil war, replacing incompetent officers, either by veterans trained in the service, or by men who had shown fitness for their commands.

I should like to cite here a bill which I introduced into the House on February 9, as I was unaware at that time that words of similar import had been in the original Senate bill.

A bill (H. R. 14524) providing for appointments in the consular service and for filling vacancies in the higher grades.

Be it enacted, etc., That effective with the passage of this act all candidates for appointment in the consular service shall apply for the lowest grade and be required to pass an examination under the civil-service rules, and removals shall be subject to such rules and be made for cause.

SEC. 2. That all vacancies occurring in the consular service shall be filled by transfer from a lower class of the same grade in which such vacancy occurs, or by promotion from a lower grade.

I had intended to call this bill up to-day as an amendment, but I withheld it at the request of the Member from Pennsylvania, who was in charge of the bill under discussion, and who feared that any diversion might imperil the passage of the bill. I believe, however, that my bill will effect the remedy so much desired, and will result in marked improvement throughout the consular service. As to the question of our ambassadors, they must, of necessity, be appointed by the President on the same lines in which he selects his Cabinet, but when it comes to the question of their residences abroad, it is a burning shame that the United States does not own its own residence in every country where there is a minister. Other nations do this, and the result of the matter is that their ambassadors are housed in a manner worthy of the nation, and the effect produced on the nation to which the ambassador is accredited is correspondingly impressive. Within a few years a residence was offered to the United States for its minister at a very important point at the price of $300,000. This offer was declined, and the French Government took this house for its minister this last year at $600,000. One of the finest residences in a comparatively unimportant place which I visited was the house of the consul from Ecuador.

Another reason for the ownership by the United States of ministerial houses is that our ambassadors are obliged to bind themselves for a three-years' lease, and if they change their location they must sublet at serious loss. In several cases it has appeared that the cost of a suitable residence took their entire pay. An ambassador must represent his nation properly from a social standpoint. The nation expects it and we expect it. Give him, then, at least a residence commensurate with the dignity of his nation. It is a good investment, viewed from any standpoint. The various points in the bill before us have been most carefully elucidated by those having it in charge and show thoughtful study. The classification of the service is a great step in consular reform, and the abolition of fees as a consular perquisite is another move in the right direction. I am sorry, however, to see in many cases that the increase of salary is not by any means an equivalent for the loss of the fees, which, under this bill, are now turned over to the United States Government. The appointment of inspectors, as provided in the bill, will undoubtedly result in great improvements and, I venture to predict, in great changes as well. A weeding out of unsuitable men will take place on a very large scale, but no good consul need fear any inspection. So we may, one and all, heartily commend the bill and urge its passage. It is not an ideal bill and its strongest friends do not claim that it is, but it is, in their judgment, all the legislation which can be obtained at this time by the action of the Senate and the House, and is decidedly a step, and a long step, in the right direction. Future legislation will be needed to perfect the reforms of our consular service. All patriotic Members who desire to see their nation properly represented among the nations of the earth will come forward and speed the bill to its passage and will thus strengthen the hands of that far-seeing and accomplished statesman who is at the head of this service, as well as those of the honored leader of this great nation.

Receipts and Expenditures of the District of Columbia.

OF

HON. EDWARD DE V. MORRELL,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, April 9, 1906.

The House having under consideration bills relating to the District of Columbia—

Mr. MORRELL said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In taking up the question of receipts in the District of Columbia, I beg to say that this is the last of the subjects in connection with the government of the District of Columbia to which I shall call the attention of the House, and I shall endeavor to show that while as a whole the amount received from the various licenses, etc., is fairly large, yet there are many instances where the receipts of the District could be increased and a certain amount of economy practiced. I might add that these remarks which I have made from time to time calling attention to what I consider certain abuses in the District has not been for the sake of querulous criticism, but, by calling attention to them, if possible to bring about a better state of affairs in the District.

I may also state that in my remarks I have dealt wholly with the subject and not with the individual.

In the matter of receipts for licenses, privileges, etc., Washington fails to make as good a showing as other cities of similar grade. Much has been said about differences of condition between Washington and other cities as an excuse for the greater expenditures of Washington. This, as I have said, is a very cheap way to avoid the real issue. The District of Columbia, considered as a municipality, covers an area of about 64 square miles, much of which is agricultural and swamp land, and the additional expense of governing such area is not correspondingly equal to the expense of governing an equally crowded area.

For example, Buffalo police precincts run from 0.72 to 10.07 square miles each; Chicago has three times the area and pays but 50 per cent more; Philadelphia has twice the area, but expends but little more than 50 per cent more. The excessive expenditures of Washington are not chargeable to conditions so much as to extravagant management and inharmonious adjustments.

Thus the management of market houses seems to be faulty when all receipts from these sources in Washington are compared with the audited statements of the fiscal officers of other cities. I give the figures:

Comparative statement of receipts and expenditures of market houses, 1904.

City.	Receipts.	Expenditures.	Excess.
Washington	$11,954	$6,240	$5,714
Baltimore	58,973	25,231	33,742
Newark	41,622	23,737	17,885
Pittsburg	65,570	(a)
Boston	110,552	13,586	96,966
Buffalo	56,652	12,149	44,403
St. Louis	32,546	7,304	25,242
Cleveland	36,860	27,288	9,572

[a] No expense stated.

Newark, a smaller city, has a net excess of receipts of revenue over Washington of about 300 per cent; Baltimore exceeds Washington more than 800 per cent; Boston, more than 1,700 per cent; Buffalo, nearly 800 per cent, and St. Louis nearly 400 per cent. The gross market receipts of Washington are out of all proportion to those of the other cities, and suggest a weakness that should be remedied.

In the same way the dramshop licenses seem to show a somewhat poorer revenue-producing power.

Revenue from dramshop licenses, 1904.

Washington	$415,985
St. Louis	1,267,507
Buffalo (1902)	566,995
Boston	1,000,000
Pittsburg	508,712
Baltimore	575,364
Cleveland	751,004
Cincinnati	418,256
Detroit (one-half to the State)	648,000
Newark (1902)	360,200

St. Louis and Boston, about twice the size of Washington, take in, respectively, three and three and one-half times as much as Washington. The revenue should be greater, and if the license is not high enough Congress should remedy the defect. If we must have saloons, let them contribute to the revenue in proportion to those of St. Louis and Boston. The liquor licenses of Washington ought to yield about $650,000. The license is $800 per annum and the traffic will safely stand $1,000.

Chicago charges a flat $1,000 license fee. Without going into the ethical questions of whether high license tends to destroy an immoral business or whether the business itself is immoral, it seems that a $1,000 license has proven itself a good business standard and not grievously burdensome to small dealers. A tax of $3 a day is not a heavy tax upon a business whose margin of profits is abnormally great. A graduated license tax beginning with $1,000 for small dealers and increasing to $2,000 for large establishments would possibly be more equitable, more regulatory, and a better revenue producer.

The wholesale liquor license tax is $300 per annum and that of the brewers $200. It appears to me that each of these should be not less than $500. Private bankers are charged $500, and their business is no more profitable than that of brewers or wholesale liquor dealers. Distillers and rectifiers are also charged $250, and these, it is suggested, should also pay $500. For the year ending October 31, 1905, the barroom licenses of Washington numbered 518 and the wholesale liquor licenses numbered 136. For the license year beginning November 1, 1905, 515 barroom applications were recorded and 134 wholesale liquor applications. It will thus be seen that the business year by year sustains about the same proportion, and it is believed that these proportions would not be changed materially by the higher license tax indicated.

The total receipts from licenses in 1904, other than barroom, were $110,496. A comparison of this amount with the amounts received by other cities for licenses, franchises, and privileges, other than barroom licenses, will show that this feature of revenue has been underworked in the District of Columbia to the advantage of those holding the franchises and special privileges:

Washington:
All other licenses	$110,496
Franchise taxes, street railways	44,292
Cleveland	117,567
Cincinnati:
Licenses	134,292
Excise taxes, street railways	230,045
Excise taxes, gas and electric-light companies	4,179
St. Louis	837,653
Franchises	266,440
Baltimore:
Franchises	444,306
Licenses	90,313
Boston:
Street railways	360,000
Dog taxes	25,000
Excise tax, street railway	65,000

Whisky and other liquors pay about six-sevenths of the total license taxes of Washington, and the same is approximately true of all the other cities, except St. Louis, where a far better adjustment of all licenses has been made, and with seeming success. The various schedules of license rates now applicable to Washington seem to be unwisely adapted, to be discriminative in their nature, and are therefore poor revenue producers. Following are a few marked instances:

LICENSES FOR SIGHT-SEEING CARS.

The Seeing Washington Cars that run daily upon the street railway tracks of Washington charge the public 50 cents a trip upon all cars. Their license tax is $6 per annum for each car not exceeding ten passengers, and $12 a car for those exceeding ten passengers. This would make a daily license rate of from 2 to 4 cents a car. The license rates should be from $25 to $50 per annum. And the automobile cars for seeing Washington should pay twice these rates. To charge a merry-go-round $12 per week, or $624 per annum, and these cars from $6 to $12 per annum is to discriminate against amusement for the children in favor of sight-seers from abroad.

Why land-improvement companies should pay $50 per annum and investment associations $100 per annum is hard to understand. Pawnbrokers at $100 and note brokers at $100 are in sad contrast with private banks at $500 per annum. Businesses that charge 3 per cent a month should pay a $500 license, if they can not be altogether prevented.

INSPECTION EXPENDITURE.

The appropriations by Congress for inspection of all kinds in 1904 amounted to $139,402, itemized as follows:

Inspector of building	$2,750
Principal assistant	1,600
Five assistant inspectors	6,000
Five assistant inspectors	5,000
Temporary inspectors	2,400
Total building inspectors	17,750
Inspector of plumbing	2,000
Seven assistant inspectors	8,400
Six assistant inspectors	6,000
Five members plumbing board	1,500
Total plumbing	17,900
Inspector of fuel	1,500
One assistant	1,100
Total fuel	2,600
Inspector of licenses	1,200
One assistant	1,000
Total licenses	2,200
Four inspectors, personal-tax board	4,800
Inspector of streets	1,200
Two assistants	2,400
Inspector of asphalt	2,400
Two assistants	1,500
Total streets	7,500
Inspector of gas	2,000
One assistant	1,000
One assistant	840
Total gas	3,840
Inspector of sewers	1,200
General inspector	1,300
Total sewers	2,500
Two inspectors of property	1,872
Inspector of material	1,200
Inspector	1,500
Inspector	1,200
Two inspectors	2,400
One inspector	900
One inspector	1,500
Total inspectors	7,500
Inspector of bridges	1,200
Four inspectors, street sweeping	4,800
Ten inspectors, street sweeping	11,000
Three inspectors, street sweeping	2,700
Total street sweeping	18,500
Six inspectors, stables	7,200
Two inspectors, stables	1,800
One inspector, stables	975
Total stables	9,975
Two electrical inspectors	2,400
Inspector of lamps	1,000
Three assistants	2,700
Total lamps	3,700
Chief inspector, health	1,800
Thirteen sanitary and food inspectors	15,500
One sanitary inspector	1,800
One sanitary inspector	1,200
One marine-products inspector	1,200
Four sanitary inspectors	4,000
Three sanitary inspectors	2,700
Traveling expense, inspectors	1,200
Total health	28,900
Four inspectors, charity	2,880
One inspector, charity	900
Traveling expense	400
Total charity	4,180
Inspector, child caring	480

One inspector, water	$1,200
Eight inspectors, water	6,400
One inspector, water	900
Total water	8,500
Total inspection	139,400

It is hard to turn around in Washington without running into an inspector. Inspectors of buildings, plumbing, fuel, licenses, personal property, streets, asphalt, gas, sewers, property, material, smoke, street sweeping, stables, electricity, lamps, health, food, marine products, horse diseases, charity, child caring, and water.

There are 129 men on the rolls as inspectors, drawing a total compensation of $139,000.

Inspector of buildings is very important, but why should Buffalo pay $8,800 for this work and Washington $17,750? Pittsburg pays but $11,500, and Boston not quite as much as Washington.

Washington pays $17,900 for plumbing inspection, and St. Louis $13,502. Other cities seem to prosper very well without any expenditure whatever for this purpose. Why pay fourteen men $16,400 for no apparent service?

Citizens of Washington tell me that they have lived eighteen months in a house without ever seeing an inspector. Others say that these gentlemen come around once in a while and act very arbitrarily. They come right in exactly as if they owned the premises. They go to the spigots and to closets. They write out a military order which contains a threat of cessation of water if certain things are not done. There is no appeal, and there is no way of determining whether it is a case of graft or bad plumbing. The day after the call it is not difficult to find plumbers all over the city with pockets full of these orders. It is a principle of law that a man's house is his castle and regulations which defy this principle are autocratic and wrong. It is unwise to put this amount of power in the hands of any one man. It opens the way to graft. Owners and occupiers of property have some honesty and pride, and may be depended upon to keep their plumbing in repair. Nine-tenths of the plumbing repair in Washington is done by owners and occupiers without notice from any inspectors. The majority of cities have no such officers and those that do pay no such salaries. Buffalo gets along with six plumbing inspectors and pays them $7,400. This $17,900 might be very well omitted from the list of appropriations without injury to any one. All spies are abominable, but spies that force their way into private houses when the male members are away and without any antecedent notice are odious in the highest degree. I had investigations made in New York, Baltimore, and Philadelphia to ascertain what they paid for fuel inspection. I was surprised to find out that these cities had no such officers as fuel inspectors, and the auditors of other cities fail to itemize such an account. Of what use are they? Washington pays out $2,600 for this purpose and it is of no advantage to any one save the inspectors.

Nor is there any use for an inspector and assistant inspector for licenses. No other city boasts of this luxury, and this $2,200 may be saved without injury to anyone.

The four inspectors of the personal-tax board are unnecessary. Buffalo assesses her property with three assessors and pays them $11,500 in all. Washington has six assessors drawing $17,000 between them, and it is hard to understand the reason for the payment of $4,800 for four inspectors for the personal-tax board.

There are three inspectors of streets drawing $3,600, besides a superintendent of streets, whose pay is $2,000, and a superintendent of county roads, whose pay is $1,500. In other cities the street superintendents do their own inspecting, and there appears to be no valid reason for the additional positions in Washington. There is also an inspector of asphalt, at $2,400, and an assistant, at $1,500. Thus, $7,500 are paid for street inspection in Washington and no real service performed. There are three inspectors of gas, drawing $3,840 per annum. What their duties are no one appears to know. The gas company furnishes a poor article of gas despite their inspection and charges the people a high price for it. If we must have gas inspectors, let the Commissioners select them and cast their pay on the gas company. This company places meters in every house using gas. If the user is not proud of his meter and asks for a test he will get it. A man comes to the house and goes through certain genuflections. If he says the meter is all right you pay his bill. If he says the meter is all wrong the company pays his bill. As the company sends him to you, the meter is generally found to be virtuous, and you are mulcted for the fee. The meter registers gas burned whether the jets are lighted or not, and when you complain you are told that the meter showed no gas used, but that the office charged it up anyhow by a system of averages that is good for the gas company whether it gratifies the public or not. The gas company of Washington has a good thing and should pay for all gas inspection.

The sewer inspection of Washington is moderate. It only costs $2,500 and two men to do the work. There are two inspectors of property, drawing $1,872, and one inspector of material, at $1,200. What these gentlemen do I can not tell, but as other cities seem to exist comfortably without them, I favor their abolition here. Then there are six plain inspectors, without any other title, drawing $7,500 in all. It is possible that these six inspectors are the inspectors of all the other inspectors. They may easily be dispensed with. The bridge inspector, at $1,200, is not a bad feature if he has anything to do.

But the greatest joker of the lot is the inspection of the street-sweeping department. Seventeen men are annually employed to inspect the street-sweeping business, and they draw $18,500. Washington paid out in 1904 the sum of $179,712 for sweeping and cleaning streets, avenues, and alleys. The inspectors received nearly 11 per cent of this fund. Now, in all seriousness, what reason is there for paying street-sweeping inspectors $1,100 or $1,200 per annum each when good men may be had by the score, fully equipped mentally, morally, and physically for the work, at from $40 to $50 per month? What is the executive office for if not to enforce the street-cleaning contract? And why should the Commissioners call in seventeen men to inspect a work that in other municipalities is done by the executive office? The appropriation in 1905 for the executive office, as appears from the statutes of the United States for the third session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, page 884, was, "in all, $76,299." In addition to this the next paragraph appropriates for other expenses of the executive office, "in all, $20,300," or a total of $96,599. To this the item of $18,500 for street-sweeping inspection should be added, for the reason that a part of the Commissioners' duties is to see that contracts made by them are properly performed. If this duty is cast on seventeen other men the expense involved should be charged to the executive department. But Washington has no need for these officers, and this $18,500 should be eliminated from the account. Granting the necessity for the offices, the pay can be reasonably reduced 50 per cent. We are glad to notice that the Commissioners report that this feature of inspection is to be abolished.

There are nine inspectors of stables, drawing $9,975. Six of these men get $1,200 apiece. There are good men—good young men—who would be glad to do this work at $60 a month, and that is all it is worth. The common decency of respectability would lead good citizens to keep their stables clean, and nine young Americans of vigor and stamina at $60 a month each would, like Hercules of old, see to it that the stables of such Washingtonians as prefer to follow in the footsteps of Augeas should not only be cleaned, but kept clean all the while.

Why pay out $2,400 for two electrical inspectors and $3,700 for four lamp inspectors? The inspectors get $6,100 and the repair men $5,540. Let us have more repairs at better pay and less inspection at lower pay.

Health inspection is something that appeals to the wisdom of all men, and a certain amount of it is proper. But Washington seems to have an excess of inspection and only an average of health. There are twenty-four health inspectors in this city, drawing $27,700 per annum, besides using about $1,200 as traveling expenses for junketing trips to outside dairy farms. Baltimore gets an equally good inspection for $11,707 and Buffalo for $14,715.

Even the charities of Washington cost $2,880 for inspection. Why pay four good, clean, honest men $720 each a year for ferreting out poverty? Where are the ministers of the city? Where are the humane societies? It seems to me that these people are as credible and as honest as any set of inspectors, and they may always be relied upon to do the best of charitable work.

Then, while stable inspectors get $1,200 a year, the inspector for the child-caring charities is paid the munificent salary of $480 a year. If nine men are worth $9,975 for stable inspection, this child-caring inspector ought to be worth about $4,000 a year. Give this inspector $1,000 at the least and cut down the stable contingent to $60 a month.

Then, notwithstanding the $17,900 paid nineteen plumbing inspectors, $8,500 more must be given to ten other men as water inspectors and an unknown amount for smoke inspection.

AUDITING DISTRICT ACCOUNTS.

From volume 1, page 20, of the Commissioners' Report for 1905, it appears that books and records of the Washington Asylum, the Industrial Home School, the office of the inspector of gas and meters, the office of the superintendent of the bathing beach, the offices of the several market masters, the office of the pound master, the accounts of collateral received at the several police precinct stations, the accounts kept in the police department of various funds and moneys received in the nature of trust funds, and of a number of other institutions and establishments connected with the District government involving money transactions have not been made the subject of periodical examinations by the auditing department. The auditor's office is a most important one, but if it is not auditing and examining the institutions of the District which handle money it is not performing its most important function. The Commissioners say that the present clerical force is inadequate and ask for a greater amount of help. A greater economy in other lines of expenditure will make possible the complete development of this most important office. The last Congress authorized the employment of fifteen persons in that office and appropriated $23,750. It also provided for five other clerks, at an aggregate expenditure of $5,500; in all, twenty persons, at a charge of $29,250. This would seem to be enough to do all the work required of the office, and to do it well. The auditor receives no larger salary than should be paid for his work. The prices paid for other clerks are higher in proportion to Buffalo prices. The Buffalo salaries are: Comptroller, $4,000; deputy comptroller, $2,000; chief bookkeeper, $1,600; assistant bookkeeper, $1,100; three assistant bookkeepers, at $900; warrant clerk, $1,100; assistant, $900; bond and insurance clerk, $1,100; local accounts clerk, $1,000; statement clerk, $1,000; recording clerk, $900; local tax-roll clerk, $900; markets accounts clerk, $800; tax-sale clerk, $1,500; three assistants, at $1,000; countersigning clerk, $900; five clerks, $900; stenographer, $720; in all, twenty-six good clerks and officers for $29,720. If Buffalo can retain twenty-six good men for $29,720 Washington ought certainly to retain twenty-five men in minor positions, and a reorganization would preduce good results.

RÉSUMÉ—REVENUE.

From Bulletin No. 20 of the Department of Commerce and Labor it appears that Washington surpassed many first-class cities in the aggregate of corporate receipts for 1903. This appears from the following table, taken from page 452 of that report.

Aggregate corporate receipts.

Washington	$10,309,266
Pittsburg	10,947,188
Cincinnati	8,431,450
Baltimore	9,092,982
Buffalo	7,013,140
San Francisco	6,470,545
Milwaukee	4,608,257
Detroit	6,284,102
New Orleans	4,541,058

Receipts from general revenues.

Washington	$9,360,149
Baltimore	7,222,784
Cleveland	6,083,107
Buffalo	5,363,000
San Francisco	6,087,171
Pittsburg	6,232,000
Cincinnati	4,230,000
Milwaukee	3,792,000
Detroit	4,914,000
New Orleans	4,164,000

The difference between the aggregate corporate revenues and the aggregate general or ordinary revenues is less in Washington than in any other city of its class, owing to the fact that the United States pays one-half the estimated expenses allowed by Congress.

RÉSUMÉ—EXPENDITURE.

It has already been shown by me that the expenses for nearly all municipal purposes are greater in Washington than in cities of larger size. This is emphasized by extracts from Bulletin No. 20, as shown in the following tables:

Statement of expenditures by cities for municipal purposes.

1. GENERAL ADMINISTRATION.

City.	Expenditure.	Per capita.
Washington	$265,368	$0.91
Baltimore	477,222	.90

8. SANITATION.

Washington	$474,061	$1.62
Baltimore	391,281	.74
Cleveland	320,475	.77
Buffalo	344,171	.90
Pittsburg	422,251	1.22
Cincinnati	344,089	1.03
New Orleans	262,703	.87
Detroit	257,769	.83

9. PUBLIC RECREATION.

Washington	$139,926	$0.48
Cleveland	120,280	.29
Pittsburg	114,698	.33
Cincinnati	46,414	.14
Milwaukee	70,233	.22
New Orleans	38,189	.13

10. SCHOOLS.

City.	Aggregate.	Per capita.	Teachers.	Per capita.
Washington	$1,690,371	$5.76	$965,995	$3.29
Baltimore	1,848,778	3.48	1,048,840	1.98
Buffalo	1,651,403	4.33	925,636	2.43
San Francisco	1,333,398	3.74	1,021,997	2.87
Pittsburg	1,737,156	5.04	772,317	2.24

Milwaukee	1,079,738	3.45	644,476	2.06
Detroit	1,098,632	3.55	765,141	2.47

[a] This department asks less by way of appropriations than any one in the District, and seems to be the only one not dominated by extravagance.

[b] This department is out of all proportion in expenditure.

[c] The expenditure for highways in the District of Columbia is not justified by any principle of municipal authority.

Besides this, Washington pays a higher per capita for the aggregate of schools than any other city of the same or greater size, except New York and Boston.

She also pays a higher per capita for teachers than Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Baltimore, and Cleveland.

City.	All other expenses.	Per capita.
Washington	$415,116	$1.42
Buffalo	400,936	1.05
San Francisco	268,003	.73
Cincinnati	211,388	.64
Milwaukee	192,281	.61
Detroit	259,822	.84

Besides paying a higher per capita than any city of greater size except New York, Boston, Cleveland, and Pittsburg, library expenses are greater than in St. Louis, Baltimore, Cleveland, Buffalo, San Francisco, Milwaukee, and Detriot, without the material or the facilities of these cities.

Thus, in nearly every respect the expenses of Washington are greater than those of larger cities equally well governed. Such a condition is unfortunate and seems to demand the remedial arm of legislative curtailment.

The Free-Alcohol Bill.

A means of convenience, comfort, and profit to the whole American people.

OF

HON. WILLIAM B. McKINLEY,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, April 16, 1906,

On the bill (H. R. 17453) for the withdrawal from bond, tax free, of domestic alcohol when rendered unfit for beverage or liquid medicinal uses by mixture with suitable denaturizing materials.

Mr. McKINLEY of Illinois said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In trespassing upon the time of the House, I avail myself of the opportunity to voice the hope of my constituents that the House will adopt this measure without a dissenting vote. There is no question of the popular demand for the bill. The people are pronouncedly for it. The newspapers are urging its passage, and the distinguished committee of the House, after exhaustive consideration of the subject, has reported it favorably. Whatever opposition there is, while not in all cases inspired by special interests, is of such a character that the House can not at this time well afford to give heed to it.

The more I have studied the bill the more I am impressed with its importance. It proposes substantially to remove the tax on alcohol used in the arts and industries, when rendered unfit for beverage or liquid medicinal purposes by being mixed with suitable denaturizing materials in the presence and under the direction of an official of the Government selected for that purpose. To do this will be to do what every other civilized government has already done. It is a means of providing an economical fuel, light, and power for industrial uses. It will be the realization of legislation vainly sought for years. As far back as 1888 the platform of the Republican party declared for the removal of the tax on this commodity. One of the arguments against this bill is that it is an entering wedge to a reduction of revenue by tariff changes. While the people of the section of the country from which I come want no tariff changes that will affect the present unparalleled prosperity, nevertheless they are willing to see certain revisions, such as will be brought about by this bill. It is perhaps the first step toward anything like tariff revision by the present House. As such, it deserves the most careful scrutiny, for the tariff fabric of our country is so complex, so many-sided, so complicated, so interwoven as to make necessary the exercise of the greatest wisdom in attempting any reduction of the revenue, as this bill obviously will do. This bill does not, however, remove the customs duty on alcohol, but simply abolishes the internal-revenue tax thereon.

In the enactment of any legislation of this character the Congress must consider, first, what will be the moral effect; second, will the proposed law interfere with the revenues of the Government to the extent that it will embarrass proper governmental expenditure? The third point to consider is whether it will be a source of additional production of revenue to the people by bringing to the market undeveloped resources and whether it will create new industries.

When, a few years ago, the question of abolishing the very heavy tax of $1.10 per wine gallon upon alcohol was first suggested, the objection was at once raised that the unlimited production of alcohol would involve increased intemperance while it would also materially reduce the amount of internal revenue collected from alcohol. An investigation of the situation then created brought out the fact that by the addition of 2½ to 10 per cent of wood alcohol all opportunity to use the product as a beverage was done away with. This bill does not remove the tax which we, like every other advanced nation, impose on whisky and spirits. On the contrary, it specifically provides that the alcohol shall first be rendered unfit for beverage or like uses under governmental supervision before it can be withdrawn from bond free of tax. The temperance people throughout the country heartily indorse the movement. Such a strong Prohibition leader as John G. Woolley in his newspaper says:

Suppress the improper use of alcohol and promote its use in the arts and industries.

Although the country is enjoying unexampled prosperity, there is no justification for the reduction of its revenues unless the result thereby obtained is the greatest good for the greatest number. That is the final test which every measure of this kind must meet. While in some parts of the country certain special interests may be injured, an honest investigation of the conditions which gave birth to this measure will demonstrate that it means cheaper light, cheaper fuel, and cheaper power. It means results which in the very sequence of industrial progression must operate to the benefit of the people, directly or indirectly, not in particular sections, but all over the country.

Within the last year, probably with the characteristic good fortune of the present Administration, our revenues have improved beyond our most sanguine expectation. We now have a surplus of over a million to draw on as against a deficit of twenty-five millions last year. Just how much this measure will reduce the revenues no one seems to be able to tell exactly. The Secretary of the Treasury, himself a strong advocate of the bill, is willing only to venture a guess. He has gone so far, however, as to intimate that even if this bill reduced the revenue by any such sum as $10,000,000 we could now stand it.

It is not probable, Mr. Speaker, that such a reduction will be caused. On the contrary, there will hardly be any appreciable loss of revenue, as owing to the present prohibitory tax we get comparatively no revenue from this commodity for mechanical or similar uses. We have been using alcohol for light and industrial purposes since 1860, and yet all along we have restricted its use for many legitimate purposes by taxation. Statistics show that, on account of this excessive taxation, practically no grain alcohol is being used in our industries, and that, where Germany distills 100,000,000 gallons per year for strictly industrial purposes, we only produce about one or two million gallons for the same purpose. The removal of this tax is demanded by the farmer as well as the manufacturer, the laborer as well as the artisan, because it increases the efficiency and utility of a great and new economic medium. Many articles are imported from abroad because they can be made cheaper there with the use of untaxed alcohol than we can make them in this country. These articles include artificial silks made from cotton, aniline colors and dyes, celluloid, transparent soap, incandescent mantles, chemicals, and others, all of which can be produced here as cheaply as abroad if this bill passes. The number of uses to which untaxed alcohol may be put is surprisingly large. It can be used in the making of powder, also as a substitute for gasoline in stoves and motors, as fuel for the operation of machinery and particularly farming machinery, for pumping water, thrashing grain, and in connection with many uses of stationary power on the farm. It can be utilized in the making of electrical apparatus, furniture of all kinds, passenger cars, pianos, wagons, boots and shoes, various kind of metal work, and in all kinds of manufactures, arts, and sciences. Since the discovery of incandescent mantles, which are also made by use of this alcohol, it is found that 1 gallon of alcohol will produce as much light as 2 gallons of kerosene, and a gallon of alcohol will produce 10 per cent more power than the same amount of gasoline; besides, it is much safer and cleaner. Therefore the bringing of this product into the market can not help but reduce the price of the trust-controlled petroleum products.

But, Mr. Speaker, the best feature of this bill is that in the proper course of industrial development it will assure an enlarged market for the farmer. The alcohol contained in grains and starch vegetables now largely goes to waste. The passage of this bill will open a new market of untold value for the grain products of central Illinois. And that, of course, Mr. Speaker, is another reason why I am so heartily in favor of it. Potatoes, sorghum molasses, corn, and the stalks of corn contain an undeveloped the large supply to be used for the profit of the American farmer. Two and a half gallons of alcohol are produced from a bushel of corn, and it is estimateed that 100 gallons can be distiled from each acre of cornstalks. Cornstalks now sell in the field for 50 cents per acre. If this product now selling for 50 cents per acre can be manufactured into 100 gallons of alcohol, to be sold at $20 per acre, the advantage to the farmer is large indeed.

I agree with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CALDERHEAD], when he so aptly says:

Every new use that can be made of any farm product is better for them than any legislation for the purpose of protecting—for instance, the protective tariff.

I submit, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that this House should not hesitate to give encouragement to any agricultural industry so comprehensive in character and scope as that which this measure will create. I do not claim that it will bring about all the extravagant results some gentlemen have predicted, but I do believe it will open up new opportunities to the farmers and workingmen of the country.

Even admitting that the benefits to be derived from this measure are uncertain, I believe that any practical legislation, conceived in common sense, enacted after honest deliberation, for the benefit of the American farmer is at least worthy of a fair trial. His patriotic impulse would be the first to discover the failure of any experiment, and he will be prompt to tell us.

Mr. Speaker, the two great units in American civilization are the farmer and the workingman. Let us give them every chance to widen their opportunities and improve their condition. We have already given the farmer rural free delivery. We are giving him cheaper and quicker railroad facilities. The railroad rate bill, which this House so promptly passed, will insure better and fairer transportation. Now let us give him a means to cheapen light, fuel, and power, and in the doing so create new markets for his products and at the same time benefit the condition of the workingman. The Congress can not too carefully conserve the interests of these two great factors in our national life. [Applause.]

Liability of Employers.

No railroad company should be permitted to take advantage of its own negligence and defend the results thereof by pointing out that its employee did, or failed to do, something which a prudent man would not have done, when the thing done or omitted was in effect the result of the coercive policy of the company.

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. RYAN,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, April 2, 1906,

On the bill (H. R. 239) relating to liability of common carriers by railroads to their employees.

Mr. RYAN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: This bill, known as the "employers' liability bill," is intended to modify the common-law rules with reference to the liability of common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to their employees for personal injuries.

The provisions of the bill meet a widespread demand for legislation. Railroads are operated in every State and Territory of the United States, and over nearly every mile of line is carried traffic which is subject to the regulating power of the Congress. The men and the carriers engaged in moving traffic in nearly every case handle interstate commerce. Under the Constitution the power is given to Congress "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." As the law now is in the various States and Territories there is no uniformity. Under given circumstances an injured employee may recover in one State or Territory, while under the same circumstances in another jurisdiction he would be unable to recover damages. It is to meet this condition that the Congress is asked to pass this bill.

This measure is strongly urged by the railroad employees' organizations of the United States. There are at present employed by the different railroad companies of this country over one and one-quarter millions of men, and this bill is one in which all of them are greatly interested. I have received, and presented to this House, from all the railroad lodges in Buffalo, the city I have the honor, in part, to represent on this floor, petitions and resolutions favoring the enactment of this bill.

There should be no question of the constitutionality of this bill or its application. It applies to every case where the employee or the carrier was at the time engaged in the movement of interstate traffic. Any employee injured will have the right of recovery if the carrier be engaged in the movement of interstate commerce.

The United States Supreme Court has declared that—

In the matter of interstate commerce the United States are but one country, and are and must be subject to one system of regulations and not a multitude of systems.

Justice Brewer, in the class of cases legislated upon in the present bill, has stated the principles involved very concisely:

Commerce between the States—

he said—

is a matter of national regulation, and to establish it as such was one of the principal causes which led to the adoption of our Constitution. To-day the volume of interstate commerce far exceeds the anticipation of those who framed this Constitution, and the main channels through which the interstate commerce passes are the railroads of the country. Congress has legislated in respect to this commerce not merely by the interstate-commerce act and its amendment (24 Stat., 379, ch. 104), but also by an act passed at the last session, requiring the use of automatic couplers on freight cars. (Public Acts, Fifty-second Congress, second session, ch. 113.) The lines of this very plaintiff in error extends into half a dozen or more States, and its trains are largely employed in interstate commerce. As it passes from State to State, must the rights, obligations, and duties subsisting between it and its employees change at every State line? If to a train running from Baltimore to Chicago it should, within the limits of the State of Ohio, attach a car for a distance only within that State, ought the law controlling the relation of a brakeman on that car to the company be different from that subsisting between the brakeman on the through cars and the company? * * * It is obvious that the relations between the company and employee are not in any sense of the term local in character, but one of a general nature.

DOCTRINE OF FELLOW SERVANT.

This bill in the first section abolishes the doctrine of fellow-servant, and provides, in case of an employee's injury or death, the railroad shall be liable for damages, notwithstanding it may be caused by the negligence of a coemployee.

The provisions of this section will be most potent in establishing and preserving a uniform law covering the rights and liabilities of carriers and their employees whenever the carriers are engaged in interstate commerce. The brakeman and switchman in Maine will have no greater nor more restricted right to recover for injuries than will the same classes of employees in North Carolina and California. The laws of every State, whether judge-made or statute, will have to give way to the law of Congress.

The second section of the bill changes the common-law doctrine of contributory negligence. In a large number of jurisdictions, including the State of New York, wherever an employee has been guilty of the slightest negligence he is barred from recovery, no matter how much the carrier may have been negligent. In some courts this doctrine is carried to such an extreme that an employee injured in the discharge of his duty has been held, as a matter of law, to be guilty of contributory negligence for the reason that if he had not placed himself within reach of danger he would not have been injured; as, for example, a railroad company hauling a car with a defective coupler, to operate which an employee must go between the cars. It has been held that by going between the cars to lift the pin by hand the employee has failed to use proper care, that the failure to use such care constitutes contributory negligence, and that no recovery can be had. It is to meet such holdings as these that we are enacting the proposed law.

There can be no recovery under this bill by an injured employee where his negligence has been other than slight and the carrier's negligence has been comparatively gross. These matters are to be determined by the jury from the evidence. The damages are to be diminished as the injured employee was careless. They are to be increased as the carrier was negligent. In other words, in proportion as the one or the other was the more to blame for the accident so are the damages to be apportioned. It is a principle in the rules governing cases in admiralty that the one most in fault must bear the greater portion of the burden if the accident results from the negligence of both.

As a matter of justice, as a matter of equity, aye, of right, where a carrier, as a result of his negligence, has endangered the life or limb of its employee, it should be made to recompense such employee if he is injured as a consequence of the carrier's negligence.

It may be said that the employee should not have undertaken to use the defective appliance, still it must always be remembered that a failure to perform the work for which the employee was engaged is sufficient cause for prompt dismissal.

More often than otherwise the employee has a family dependent upon him. For every position in railroad services there are many applicants. If the present employee will not undertake the danger another is waiting for the job who will undertake the risk. No railroad company should be permitted to take advantage of its own negligence and defend the results thereof by pointing out that its employee did, or failed to do, something which a prudent man would not have done, when the thing done or omitted was in effect the result of the coercive policy of the company.

RELIEF FUND OR DEATH WARRANT.

The third section of the bill has the effect of practically nullifying the contracts of employment or relief fund, by some railroad employees called the "death warrant," that is very generally used by the railroad officials in this country. Men seeking employment as engineers, switchmen, trainmen, firemen, or in any capacity are usually required to sign this contract, discharging the company from liability for personal injuries. The form of contract used by the relief departments of the railroads to insure the employee discharges the company from any possible liability for personal injury to the employee. This release, arbitrarily exacted from the employee, should and will be abrogated by this legislation.

The last section of the bill provides that the existing safety-appliance laws shall not be affected by the bill under consideration. It should be borne in mind that section 8 of the safety-appliance act abolishes the doctrine of assumption of risk wherever the employee was injured while handling a car or train which was not equipped or operated as required by that act. Prior to the passage of the safety-appliance act the commonest defense of negligent carriers was that the employee knew of the defect, and as it was a dangerous and hazardous occupation the risk was one incident to his employment, and any injury consequent thereto was one for which the carrier was not liable. To meet such an unjust situation the safety-appliance statute abolished that defense.

It is well-recognized law that the violation of a statute is negligence per se, or at least evidence of negligence per se. After the passage of the safety-appliance act there crept into the rulings of the courts an enlarged doctrine of contributory negligence, and while this defense had always existed, it had been restricted in its application; but as a defense for negligent carriers this defense or doctrine has been largely extended, in some cases to such extent that an employee injured is without recourse, as one court put it, because "he let his head get caught."

It is to protect the injured employee in such cases that this legislation is proposed. The movement of trains and the carriage of traffic from one portion of this country to another is an occupation which involves strength of mind and body. No other occupation is so attended with risks of great bodily injuries. The men engaged in this service are entitled to every safeguard which can be thrown around them. Enact this law and there is an added incentive to compel the carrier to be more careful, and to have a more rigid inspection service; that its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, tracks, roadbeds, ways, and works be kept in the best possible condition. Not only will this statute have its good effect upon railroad employees, but it will have a wider effect in that the safety of the public will be better protected.

POSITION OF RAILROAD EMPLOYEES.

In the hearings on this bill before the Committee on the Judiciary the position of the railroad employees and the necessity for the enactment of this bill were very clearly presented by Mr. H. R. Fuller, representing the different railroad organizations. Mr. Fuller in part said:

The doctrine of contributory negligence, as applied by some of our courts, works great injustice to the employee, for the reason that no matter how grossly negligent the master may be, if the servant is in the slightest degree negligent he is debarred from recovery, and is therefore made to bear not only the burden of his own slight negligence, but also the burden of the master's gross negligence, thus permitting the master to go scot-free and not answer in the slightest degree for his gross negligence.

It is not our desire to ask that an employee be paid for an injury that he alone is responsible for, but we do think gross negligence is worse than slight negligence, and the person guilty thereof should not be released from answering therefor simply because some one else is guilty of slight negligence.

We believe such a rule has a tendency to make the master less vigilant regarding the safety of his servants.

Some of the arguments against the fellow-servant doctrine can be applied with as much force against the doctrine of contributory negligence.

The duties of an ordinary railroad employee are so exacting that he must work with both his head and hands, and many times when called upon to perform such duties his whole being is so absorbed and taken up with his work that he is liable to a slight degree to contribute to his own injury, but would not have done so had the master not been grossly negligent.

For example, let us say a railroad company stretches a wire across the track and it is not high enough to clear a man on the top of a box car; the company posts a bulletin on a bulletin board at a terminal 75 miles from the wire, in which the men are notified of the location of this wire. The brakeman starts out on his train, and about the time the train arrives at the place where the wire is stretched the engineer through the darkness sees the rear end of another train on the track a short distance ahead of him; he sounds the whistle for the brakeman to apply the brakes, the brakeman responds by climbing to the top of the train, and seeing the danger ahead his whole mind is taken up with the thought of stopping his train, and he speeds over the train in the darkness, applying the brakes, the thought of the overhead wire having been thoroughly removed from his mind for the time being, and it strikes him and he is thrown beneath the cars and injured. If I mistake not, some of our courts would hold that he could not recover for the reason that he had been notified of the whereabouts of the wire, and he contributed to his own injury by exposing himself to it, this, too, in the face of the fact that the company was grossly negligent by not providing longer poles upon which to string this wire.

Now, another case: We will say that a switch stand is too close to the track; it has been there for a long time and the train men know of the danger; but suddenly in the dark of night there is a call for brakes, and the brakeman swings out on the ladder on the outside of the car for the purpose of climbing to the top to apply the brakes, and this switch stand strikes him. I venture the assertion that some judges would say that he was guilty of contributory negligence, as he knew of the location of this switch stand and therefore was in a position to guard against it, regardless of the fact that the company was guilty of gross negligence in placing the switch stand so close to the track.

Another case in point is that of Schlemmer v. Buffalo, Rochester and Pittsburg Railroad Company (207 Pa., 198). The evidence shows that the company was transporting a steam-shovel car from the State of New York to a point in the State of Pennsylvania. The drawbar upon this steam-shovel car was of the old link-and-pin type, which was in violation of the national safety-appliance law. It was also much lower than the drawbar on the caboose to which it was to be coupled, which was also a violation of that law. This drawbar was also under the car about 2 feet from the end. Schlemmer, a brakeman, was ordered by his conductor to couple this steam-shovel car to the caboose, and in order to do this he had to stoop down and contract himself to about one-half his natural height, and in this position, at about 9 o'clock at night, with lamp in hand, he had to walk along under this steam-shovel car while it was moving, watch to see that he was not run down from behind by the wheels, and guide a long iron coupling bar, weighing 80 pounds, which was fastened in the drawbar on the steam-shovel car, into a slot only 2 inches wide in the automatic coupler on the caboose. He missed the coupling, and happened to raise his head a little too high, and the top of it was crushed between the steam-shovel car and the caboose, killing him instantly. His widow sought to recover damages, and the trial court held that he was guilty of contributory negligence in not keeping his head down, and withheld the case from the jury, and this decision was affirmed by the supreme court of the State of Pennsylvania.

Here was a case where the employer was grossly negligent and was also violating an act of Congress, yet because the poor brakeman, while laboring under these extraordinary disadvantages, happened to raise his head a little too high the employer is released from liability.

CASUALTIES TO TRAINMEN.

According to the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the year ending June 30, 1904, there were 2,114 train men killed and 29,275 injured on the railroads of the United States—men who were injured in the transportation of interstate commerce over which this Congress and this committee have absolute control. This report also shows that for every 120 men employed 1 was killed, and for every 9 employed 1 was injured.

In the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the year ending June 30, 1905, the following table shows casualties to employees of railroads in the United States:

	Killed.	Injured.
In train accidents	798	7,052
In coupling accidents	243	3,110
Overhead obstructions, etc	92	1,185
Falling from cars, etc	633	9,237
Other causes	1,495	24,842
Total	3,261	45,426

Mr. Chairman, there are more men killed on the railroads in one year than there were in some of the greatest battles that were ever fought for the honor of this country, and I say to you there is no class of men who are more loyal to the Government of the United States than the railroad men of this country.

We think that if the railroads were held to a strict accountability for the loss of life and limb of their employees the number of injured and killed would be diminished.

Mr. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, before the Committee on the Judiciary, said:

Let me say this in connection with the principle of the bill: Neither the men on the roads nor the men who are making application for employment on the roads want the employers' money for damages for injury. They do not want the employers' money to go to the families of injured or killed workmen. But what we want is that the penalizing of these employers shall be sufficient warranty for them to take that precaution for the protection of life and limb; and wherever there has been any law upon the statute books that has tended toward this species of legislation, it has resulted not so much in mulcting the employers in damages as it has in a marked decrease of accidents and deaths.

As Judge Caldwell said in the case of Kilpatrick v. Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf Railroad Company (121 Fed. Rep., p. 16):

Whenever it is made to appear to a railroad company that it costs more to pay the damages assessed against it by the verdicts of juries for maintaining a dangerous condition of its tracks or appliances than it would cost to substitute safe ones in their place, the substitution is quickly made. But as long as courts hold as a matter of law that what the witnesses in this case declared to be "simply a death trap" may be maintained with impunity and without incurring any pecuniary liability, the death trap will remain and the slaughter go on.

The enactment of this measure into law will bring the railroads to a realization of the necessity of exercising every means within their power to protect the lives and limbs of their employees and passengers.

Where heretofore railroad companies have, in defiance of statutes or in defiance of the regards of humanity, kept, maintained, and operated cars and trains in a defective condition over unsafe roadbeds, or operated their trains with unskilled and careless employees, without being required to compensate employees injured through the neglect of the carriers, they now will be compelled to exercise the greatest care in operating their roads and maintaining their equipment or else pay the damage occasioned by their negligent acts. [Applause.]

Tax-Free Alcohol for Use in the Arts and Industries.

HON. D. L. D. GRANGER,

OF RHODE ISLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, April 16, 1906,

On the bill (H. R. 17453) for the withdrawal from bond, tax free, of domestic alcohol when rendered unfit for beverage or liquid medicinal uses by mixture with suitable denaturing materials.

Mr. GRANGER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The object of this bill is to permit the withdrawal from bond, tax free, of alcohol manufactured in the United States after the same shall have been mixed with some material rendering it unfit to drink. The result of this process is popularly known as "denatured alcohol."

The bill was most carefully considered by the Committee on Ways and Means, and is reported back with a favorable recommendation. The committee held a long series of hearings, at which a great mass of testimony was elicited, showing a large demand for denatured alcohol, the great possibilities of its use, and the vast amount which it was claimed it was possible to produce. Testimony also was presented as to the dangerous effect of wood alcohol, the product of which, as the result of the high tax upon pure alcohol, is attempting to fill the place of grain alcohol in the arts and industries.

ADVANTAGE OF NATURAL RESOURCES.

It was shown that the United States is better fitted, as a great corn-producing country, for the cheap production of grain alcohol than any other nation; that up to 1861, when the internal-revenue tax was first imposed on distilled spirits in the United States, the use of alcohol industrially exceeded that of every other country, but that at the present time, as the result of the removal of this tax by all other civilized countries, the United States stands at the foot of the list of those thus using alcohol. It is difficult to estimate the exact amount of grain alcohol used for industrial purposes in this country, but David A. Wells, formerly special commissioner of the revenue, estimated it in 1861 at more than 30,000,000 gallons. It is to-day estimated at less than 5,000,000. With a per capita consumption equal to that of 1860, we should now be using for industrial purposes 80,000,000 gallons annually, even if the number of articles in which alcohol can be used had not greatly increased since 1861; but taking into account, sir, the tremendous increased use of alcohol industrially in all the other civilized countries of the world, it is evident that an estimated use of 80,000,000 gallons per annum to-day, if tax free, is far too small.

REMOVAL OF TAX BY FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

I have spoken, Mr. Speaker, of the action of foreign countries in removing this tax from grain alcohol when denatured. I should like to insert here briefly some figures produced before the committee by competent authorities as to the increased consumption of this article in foreign countries—countries, it need be borne in mind, not as well supplied with the natural resources from which alcohol is produced as is our country. Let us take Germany. The German consumption of tax-free alcohol has increased over 50 per cent. Its use in 1899 was 55,300,000 proof gallons and in 1903, 73,635,000. According to the testimony of Professor Van Schelle (hearings, p. 325) the use of denatured alcohol in Germany for traction, lighting, and heating rose from 7,920,000 proof gallons in 1885 to 63,560,000 gallons in 1902, an increase of about 800 per cent. "With the advantage of comparatively low-priced material the industries requiring alcohol have been so extensively developed that in many important lines Germany now controls the world's trade. Among these articles are the products of the great chemical industries, the coal-tar colors, lacquers, dyes, varnishes, etc. Not only does Germany practically control the trade of neutral markets in all the various chemical products, but she also sells large quantities of these articles in this country, the advantage resulting from cheap alcohol being sufficient to enable them to be sold here in spite of our protective tariff. (Cheap alcohol, please notice, Mr. Speaker, and not cheap labor.) The effect of our exorbitant internal-revenue tax on alcohol has therefore been to encourage the sale in this country of foreign products." (Moody's Magazine, January, 1906.)

The tax was removed in Belgium in 1896 and the use of the free product has grown from 250,000 proof gallons to 1,874,758 gallons in 1902. It is used for motors and agricultural machinery, for heating and cooking, for soldering lamps, and as a substitute for kerosene.

In Russia the consumption has increased from 6,864,000 proof gallons in 1880 to 52,800,000 in 1902.

PRODUCTS FROM WHICH ALCOHOL CAN BE PRODUCED.

It is, of course, well known that alcohol is found almost everywhere and is easily extracted from beets, sugar cane, molasses, grape pulp, fruit, potatoes; rice, sorghum, corn, and the residuum of the brewery. In fact, we have, if one-half of the estimates brought before the committee are true, at the home of the average American farmer an unused source of industrial wealth which, if used, will effect an industrial revolution.

We have a reputation among the nations of the world as being "smart," as letting no opportunity go by to develop and make use of the gifts nature has so lavishly bestowed upon us, and yet here for years we have laid a tax upon the fruit of the soil practically prohibitive.

PLEA FOR GENERAL TARIFF REVISION.

If the Republican party, which prides itself on its record in building up the industries of the country and takes to itself the credit for the results of seedtime and harvest and the rich treasures God has placed in the bosom of the earth, had given one-thousandth part of the time it has devoted to the development of a tariff system of taxation for the benefit of the few to a study of what might be done for the many by freeing them from a stupid and ineffective tax, the United States would not to-day be lagging behind Europe in using a great source of wealth at the door of every farmer in the land.

REMOVAL OF TAX ON ALCOHOL AN OBJECT LESSON.

Mr. Speaker, if the Committee on Ways and Means had desired to present an object lesson to the House and to the country of the need of a thorough revision of the revenue laws, they could not have chosen a better one than the tax which, having been for more than forty years upon our statute books, they now propose to repeal. A tax originally imposed to raise revenue in time of war, it has remained unchanged during changed conditions, blocking the wheels of progress, checking the efforts of invention, robbing the farmer of an opportunity to use a great part of the fruit of his toil, and compelling the industries of our country to use as a substitute for a cheap and harmless product an expensive and dangerous commodity; one, Mr. Speaker, not only dangerous to every mechanic using it, but frequently deadly in its effects and produced only at the expense of the further destruction of the forests of the country.

At various times bills have been introduced into Congress for the relief of the people by the removal of this burden, only to be buried in the oblivion of the archives of the committee. It has been left to a self-constituted committee of citizens to arouse the dormant interest of the Committee on Ways and Means of this House by an appeal to the country, with the result that as soon as it became known to the people that they were being taxed for the benefit of a few they made their wishes known in such a manner that the matter could no longer be ignored. They were heard, as I believe, Mr. Speaker, they always will be heard when once convinced of their wrongs.

ANSWER TO OBJECTIONS.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what arguments were brought before the committee against this measure? They were two: First, the supposed loss of revenue, and, second, the destruction of the wood-alcohol industry.

An examination into the first objection showed that no one could state positively the loss of revenue, as the Government does not attempt to follow the use of grain alcohol after the tax is paid, and there was no way of exactly estimating how much is now used in the arts and industries. Bearing in mind, however, the large increased use of wood alcohol and the failure of the United States to participate in the uses made of grain alcohol in other countries during the past decade, it is thought by the Secretary of the Treasury that the amount received is not over $10,000,000 per annum, and many experts placed it as low as $1,000,000; but it was admitted by Secretary Shaw that even if the tax now paid is $10,000,000 a year, it is a bagatelle compared with the benefits to be derived from the removal of the tax. Economically it is admitted the tax on alcohol used for industrial purposes is a failure.

In behalf of the wood-alcohol industry a number of gentlemen appeared before the committee, and I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that, granting their premises, I have never heard a better argument for protection. Here is an industry which, under the fostering care of the Government, has been built up. From a small beginning it has grown until its product is now 7,500,000 gallons per annum; some $20,000,000 is said to be invested in it, and over 20,000 men employed. To be sure, this has been done by taxing out of existence, by a tax of 207 per cent, the natural industry, the natural product of grain, or pure alcohol, but then that is the case in many instances of protected industries, and why should they not be allowed to continue to enjoy the fruit of their labor at the expense of the rest of the people? If it is right to tax the whole American people for the benefit of the beef trust and the steel trust and the tin trust and the watch trust, why not for the wood-alcohol trust?

EVILS OF PROTECTION.

One of the greatest evils of protection is the aftermath that always follows its enactment into law. Favored industries intrench themselves behind the doctrine of vested rights and boldly demand a perpetuity in taxation.

The wood-alcohol business is making this claim now, and other industries will be heard from when we approach the more serious problem of tariff reduction in the interests of the people.

The wood-alcohol men claim that we are morally bound to continue the tax on all grain alcohol because its abolition will ruin their business. It is not clear, however, that tax-free denatured alcohol will injure them at all. If we are to expand the use of tax-free alcohol to the limits of German use, all the wood-alcohol product will find a market as a denaturizing agent. The German product is about 73,000,000 gallons, and as 10 per cent wood alcohol will denaturize a gallon of grain alcohol all the present wood-alcohol supply will be used in the new industry.

Even at the expense of the ruin of their business, this legislation is right. There is no warrant in morals or law for the doctrine of estoppel in a government reduction of taxes. All taxes are levied at the will of government and may be removed at pleasure. All industries fostered by particular laws have notice everywhere that these laws are not passed in perpetuity.

PUBLIC DEMAND FOR TARIFF REVISION INEVITABLE.

When the people demand a change, as they are demanding it now, the change will be made irrespective of the appeals and demands of any interest affected thereby. And the people not only demand this reduction, but they are demanding other reductions in the customs laws.
